"OUR TRIP TO WASHOE."

[BY THE "CALIFORNIAN'S" LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

IN THREE PARTS.

PART TWO—PIGEON WING STOPS TO FISH, AND THEN CONTINUES HER RIDE OVER THE MOUNTAINS.

"HOW like Killarney!" we exclaimed, as we caught our first view of Lake Bigler from the summit—"how very like Killarney," we said as we stood on the piazza of the hotel and sent our eyes in wondering and admiring quest over the expanse of water blue as mid-ocean, over the snow-capped mountains looking down into it, over sloping shores and magnificent forests. It was beautiful!

We were impatient until we found ourselves rowing upon the lake, fishing a little but with indifferent success. Trout of immense size abound here—it is not unusual to catch them of twenty pounds weight—but they are sluggish and dull, affording very little sport to the fisherman, and very little delectation to the epicure. There is more excitement in catchiug an ordinary brook trout six inches long, than in pulling in a lake trout of six pounds. Their flesh (cau oue call fish "flesh?") is soft and of a most disagreeable flavor. I never tasted a fish inferior to it. We had them cooked, and served in a variety of ways, but they were equally bad in all. We fished with lines a hundred feet long—or, rather, we trolled—one cannot call it fishing so much as an illustration of faith in things unseen. In the intervals between the "bites," which were "few and far between," we floated listlessly upon the deep blue waters, looking up at the far-off sky so uarrowed by the wall of encircling mouutains that its azure arch seemed to rest upon them, or watching the long quivering lances of light as they clove their gleamiug way far down the azure depths. Sometimes we lost ourselves in pleasant memories and were silent, sometimes we chatted with our guide—an intelligent man, full of a most varied experience of travel, and of all sorts of knowledge. Once, near the margin of the lake, as we were catching minnows for bait among floating beds of tangled lily pads, which nodded their golden heads to us as we drifted by, and held up their long leaves as if to shake hands with us, I could not help saying, "How much this reminds me of the lonely lagunes of Florida!" "So it does," replied our guide, whereupou we compared notes, and discovered that twenty years ago we had been at the same post in Florida. How strange it seemed that we who had been for more than a year awakened by the same reveillé, had heard the same evening gun proclaim the sunset as it died away in distant murmurs over the great pine levels, and listened to the same tattoo at night—should meet for the first time in a small boat, on a lake at that time unknown to the white man, and in a country almost entirely unexplored!

Califoruia is full of such improbable meetings. Six thousand feet above the level of the sea we sate in our little boat, and as the current kept drifting us back towards the distant shore, so our thoughts kept drifting with it towards the land we had left behind us. Oh! the tide of memory is swifter and stronger than the waters of Lake Bigler, and it wafted us far away from the snow-capped mountains and blue lake into the silent everglades of the land of flowers—over the clear waters of many a tranquil lake and noble river—over still lagunes, where the cypress and the cedar cast a sombre shade, and the juniper stains the waters an amber hue, and the long funereal moss swings mournfully its dark banners on the sultry breeze—where the stately magnolia, queen of the forest, crowned with starry blossoms, offers a perpetual sacrifice as the wind swiugs her fragrant censers, and bears their incense up to heaven—through groves of orange trees, with their ripe fruit gleaming like globes of gold amid the dusky verdure—by green savannahs, where herds of wild deer feed upon the dewy grass—by lonely pools, where huge alligators bellow upon the slimy shores, or solitary curlews wade, or screaming fly across the waters, breaking with lagging wing the glassy surface—where wild ducks lead their callow brood to swim, and the deer comes down to drink at noon. We talked of all these things until we forgot Lake Bigler, and our trolling lines, and the sluggish trout that would not bite—we even forgot that it was Sunday, when the sudden coming up of a squall of wind awakeued us to the necessity of hurrying back to the house to escape a wetting. The wind blew cold and shrill, clouds were driven wildly across the sky, the sun was hidden suddenly as by a veil, the waters of the lake were broken up in tiny waves that lashed themselves into foam, the surf thundered against the beach—the snow upon the distaut mountains had a ghastly look—we could fancy it the shroud, which the wicked spirits of the winds had left behind them in their flight across the lake. Iu a moment all the glory of the landscape had departed. We shivered around the fire, smiling feebly at oft-repeated jokes and doing our best to be jolly. Now and then oue of our party would remark, by way of assurance, "Remember, we came for pleasure." Finally we broke up into fragments of one or two—oue found the last number of the Californian which a compassionate San Franciscan had Lent us, and read it through from beginning to end, laughing heartily over "Things." Another (despite the weather) threw himself beneath a tree and dedicated himself to the Muses to amuse himself. Another found solace in a pack of cards, and another went to sleep. After dinner we sat around a huge wood fire telling stories and laughing at them until midnight sent us to bed.

Early in the morning we took our places once more in the coach and resumed our wild race to Virginia City. For miles the road along the lake shore is as beautiful and picturesque as anything of the kind in Europe or America. It is admirably graded, perfectly smooth, following the indentations of the mountains which overhang it, and the lake which lies beneath it. One can see the tiny wavelets rippling upon the narrow beach, and the smooth white pebbles gleaming upon the silver sands far below the surface. We passed the short curves and sudden turns at the same dashing speed, nothing ever checking our flight but the interposition of a ten-mule team, sometimes in the very narrowest part of the road. At one of these most dangerous points where it seemed impossible to avoid destruction our driver dashed by as recklessly as if he had had six feet of level road instead of the crumbling edge of a precipice. "A miss is as good as a mile," quoth he. "And a good deal better sometimes," we replied. "We have seen some misses worth a dozen such miles as the one you would have given us." We passed the Glenbrook House, a new, clean-looking hotel, charmingly situated.

As long as the road wound in sight of the lake the country was beautiful, the trees perfectly magnificent, of great girth and immense height, but always pines or fir trees. Now and then a silver-leaved aspen stood shivering and shaking in the shadow of the tall cedars, as if affrighted and trembling at the melancholy moaning of the winds through the lofty pines, and occasionally in moist places we saw the tender verdure of the water-loving willow. These were the exceptions, the fir trees the rule.

As we gradually receded from the lako and approached the second summit, the trees grew smaller, the green meadows disappeared, the hills grew bleaker and barer, the long stretches of level road grew drier and dustier, and the dust which settled upon everything like a grey cloud felt like ashes to the touch. From the summit the view reached over a Sahara of desolation. There lay a desert, where there should have been a lake—in fact, it looked like the bed of an extinct lake which the sands had swallowed up. Far beyond lay Carson Valley, arid and parched, like Hagar in the wilderness with her pitcher upturned and dry. While we looked, a sudden gust of wind caught up the dust, and whirling it in spiral columns bore it in wild procession over the burning sands.

The road down into the valley was uninteresting in the extreme—ploughing its winding way through deep dust and sand, and bordered by sage brush—when it had reached its worst, we found ourselves in Carson City, the prosperous-looking Capital of Nevada Territory. It seems full of pretty villas and cottages, and experimental orchards and gardens, which had a most home-like look. It was very hot when we arrived; and as it was the first really warm weather we had felt for a long time, we enjoyed it hugely. We rested only long enough for a change of horses, and a view of the busy little town. The road all the way from Carson to Virginia was utter bleakness and desolation. Not a green thing, not a bird, not a flower. Nature seems here to have reversed her usual order of things, and to have hidden under the ground whatever of wealth she had to bestow, leaving the surface utterly naked and barren. Nothing save a few stunted cedars, standing far apart, dwarfish and distorted by the winds, and the everlasting sage brush, grey and dry, as if no refreshing showers had ever fallen upon it and no sunshine ever blessed it, but as if it had been sprinkled with ashes, and wore the garments of perpetual widowhood and desolation. The eye wandered in vain over the bleak hills and narrow valleys for some sign of life. Uncovered shafts and open-mouthed tunnels yawned at us, and heaps of earth, newly dug, disfigured the ground; they looked like the fresh-made graves in which had been buried all of humanity that had ever inhabited these desolate regions.

Only on the roads were there signs of life; wayside inns, with entertainment for man and beast; little shops, for the sale of lager bier and pies and cakes; and toll-gates, and corrals, and hay and oats for horses; hundreds of teams trod the dust into an impalpable powder; and hundreds of wagons from the mines laden with ore from the mills met hundreds of other wagons, laden with lumber and dry goods and machinery and furniture and groceries, particularly the latter, from below. They grew more and more numerous as we approached Virginia City, with its busy, populous suburbs, Gold Hill and Silver City. There the houses were strung thickly together upon the single street which was crowded with men who seemed to have nothing to do but to gather in groups before the doors and discuss stocks and mining interests generally. I could not help noticing how dreadfully earnest they seemed, and how few wore smiling faces. It was very evident that they were not having a good time. We climbed up a very steep hill, and passed through a narrow ravine between high, overhanging banks, appropriately called the "Devil's Gate." We passed multitudes of claims, with very large names painted upon them—mines that divided dividends, and mines that divided assessments—more of the latter than of the former. We passed the comfortless cabins of bachelor miners, and the snug cottages of families. We passed rosy little children playing in the muddy water, rushing through the streets; we passed the huts of Celestials, where Ah Sing and Nankin did washing and ironing; and finally, at a flying speed, we rattled through the unpaved streets of Virginia, and drew up amid a crowd of idlers at the International Hotel.

PIGEON WING.

OUR BETROTHAL.

We were walking, sometimes talking,
Sometimes silent, while great sighs
From our heart's long pent emotions,
Slowly heaving, would uprise;
And our hands would clasp each other—
Looking in each other's eyes.

While we wandered thus—one feeling,
One thought animating both—
Suddenly his arm enwound me,
Drew me to him, nothing loth,
And our lips together meeting,
Plighted we our troth—
Not a word by either spoken,
Only by that silent token
Plighted we our troth.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XIII.

THE days which followed, my dear William, were the happiest of my life. Diana was almost always near me, surrounding me with those tender cares which are almost caresses, even when they are but the effusions of charity. I easily saw that pity had reopened her heart to me. Willingly, like a spoiled child, I made use of my weakuess to obtain a thousand marks of solicitude which brought her near me; then I would take her haud, which I kept possession of, feiguing sleep, and she dared uot withdraw it for fear of awaking me. Sometimes, however, I saw her blush as if divining my thoughts, and I trembled.

My convalescence made rapid progress. Very soon I was able to rise and walk as far as my parlor, leaning on her arm. Nothing now darkened my future. Mme. de Jonval had left the chateau; we would have our loved solitude to ourselves. I regretted Madelaine somewhat; but I was too much in love to be conscious of a sorrow while Diana smiled on me.

One uight, after my godmother had retired, Bastien related to me for the hundredth time all the episodes of my illness-I amused myself every day in making him repeat his tale, because Diana played the principal role in it. Curiosity made me ask him what I talked duriug the hours of my delirium.

"By my faith," replied he with embarrassment, "you spoke of all sorts of things—like all people who have a fever."

"But what did I say?"

"Well! you were furious agaiust the Couut—against Placide—"

"What more?"

"What more!—I don't kuow; oue pays very little attention to the raviugs of a sick mau."

By his embarrassed air it was easy for me to comprehend that he was disposed to be discreet.

At last I asked, astonished at his reticence: "Did I speak of other persons?"

"Pooh!" replied he, with au indifference that I knew was feigned; "a little of everybody."

This time I was frightened. "See here, Bastien," said I, looking him iu the face; "one would believe that you were trying to make a mystery out of what was said before you."

"The fact is, Monsieur André, I would uot like to repeat things that would uot be agreeable for you to hear. I promised the Countess to be silent, as anyhow they were but the dreams of a sick man, as she said."

"Bastieu, I wish to know all!" exclaimed I, decidedly alarmed, "and I beg of you to tell me. It is of the greatest mportance to know everythiug I have said."

"If that is the case, Mousieur André," he replied, "I will conceal nothing from you. Every one is master of his own affairs, aud the moment you wish me to remember—yon will pardon me for not having forgotten anything."

"But you kill me with this delay."

"Well, then, I must tell you that during the first days you did not recognize any one, and you were furious against the Count, whom you spoke continually of killing, so that the doctor was obliged to forbid his enteriug the room, his presence excited you to such a degree. Then the Countess aud I were aloue with you. She had confidence in me, because she kuows that I would throw myself in the fire for you, and theu old Fritz was uot able to hold you duriug your fits. However, the Countess could have doue without any one—even the doctor himself—for as soon as she spoke to you, or placed her hand ou your forehead, you became docile, and you obeyed her as if you were able to comprehend the sorrow which she suffered."

"I recognized her, did I uot?"

"One would suppose uot, for you called her all the time without uoticiug that she was with you. At last, one uight, when you were drowsy, we heard you talking softly, as if in a dream; great tears rolled down your cheeks. The Countess tried to wipe them away, which awakeued you; then you commeuced to say all kiuds of things, of which I uuderstood nothing, if it was not that you spoke of Mlle. Madelaine. 'It is uot true,' said ycu. 'I have lied; go and tell my godmother that it is she that I love, and that I cau never love auy other womau. Yes, I lied in order to hide my love, which would have offended her.' I don't remember your exact words, as I went off feigniug to hear uothing, because I saw that the Countess was very much moved and embarrassed. At last, wheu you were quite calm, she came to me aud said: 'This poor child suffers a great deal. Bastien, you must uot let it be known that he has been delirious; that would alarm them.' 'Oh, madame,' replied I, 'I am dumb.' 'Yes, we can confide in you; I beg of you not to repeat this to any one. It is the fever that makes him talk thus.'

"As you may easily guess," coutinued Bastien, "I swore to be silent; but certainly my oath did not include you. It is my duty to warn you. Pardon me, Mousieur André, for knowing more of your secrets than you wish me to; but you repeated the same name so often that I must have been dumb not to comprehend what it meant. Besides, you know that I am not a man to gossip, aud the meanest person would not dare to eutertain a bad thought of the Countess, whom every one adores as if she were a saint."

Bastien's disclosures threw me into a state of profound anxiety. What would become of me when my cure should be completed? Would uot Diana seud me away, if it was but to spare me pain?

When she entered the apartment the next day, I was so much overcome with emotion that I almost fainted, and fell back in my chair. It seemed to me that my love was written on my forehead.

"Mon Dieu! André," said she, "are you worse again?"

In speaking thus she encircled me with her arms, and laid my head on her shoulder. I disengaged myself, dismayed before this pure sisterly tenderness; my better uature revolted against such a profanation.

"It is nothing," I murmured, "only a little feebleness!"

During the entire morning I passed through unheard-of agonies. For the first time I noticed a shade of reserve which had escaped me the preceding days; I remembered a thousand indications of annoyance which denoted au offended pride. Her voice had a tone that I had never known; everything showed the agitation of two hearts from whom confidence was forever banished. I suffered so cruelly in advance from the vexation into which my folly would plunge me that I was tempted to throw myself at her feet and forestall a decision which pity alone had retained on her lips; but would uot that break all ties between us? There are words which nothing can efface, and for which in all pure souls there is no oblivion.

Nevertheless, Diana's eyes expressed more sorrow than severity. A sweet melancholy, mingled with I know uot what interior radiancy transfigured her; it was thus that I had pictured the angel of charity. With the egotism of love I felt a wicked thought spring up within me; perhaps she did not dare to condemn me to exile; bnt I expelled this thought as a cowardice unworthy of either of us. I understood perfectly that I could not live at the chateau, and I resolved to immolate myself to her repose, and to spare her at least the pain of banishing me.

"Dear godmother," said I to her, calling up all my courage, "have you heard anything from my cousiu, Lady Clareucy?"

"Yes—why?"

"Only I thought that if she has waited for me, she will be very much astouished at my lack of haste to avail myself of her hospitable offers!"

"She knows that you have been very sick."

"But I shall be well in a few days, I hope; and as I ought to make this trip, it will be as well, I thiuk, uot to wait for the wiuter."

"Very true; but, mon ami, do you thiuk of going this month?"

My energy was exhausted.

"I will follow your directions," I murmured. "I fear I shall appear ungrateful either to you or to her."

"You must consult only your own convenience," said she, in a trembling voice. "I would be ashamed to detain you here. However, I hope that the doctor will dissuade you from leaving us before you are completely restored."

"I will obey," replied I.

And we dropped the snbject; but all that day, despite our eudeavors to recall our usual gaiety, the idea of separation hovered over us. Evening came, and I observed that when she left me she did not give me her hand to kiss, as usual. Left alone, I shed abnndant tears; the sacrifice was cousummated. At night, Bastien appeared at my bedside.

"Did you tell the Countess what I told you last uight?" were his first words.

"No—but why this question?"

"Because, au hour ago, the Countess sent Catherine to call me iu the laundry, and theu inquired if you had had a relapse duriug the night: I answered no; but I easily saw that her anxiety was from another cause, aud that she wished above all to know if I had told you anything that had happened during your illness; I was obliged to lie to you or her—so I boldly denied everything."

"You did well," said I; "and always say the same if she questions you again."

"That will not be difficult. Besides, M. André, I think you are wroug to give more importauce to this than it demands. You said so much duriug your fever that the Couutess will attribute your language to the disease; for instance, when you wished to kill your guardiau—"

"That's true," said I, struck with an idea so simple, but which did uot occur to me before.

I had so much need of hope that I clung to this straw from my shipwreck. Could Diana place auy belief in this strauge avowal of delirium? Certaiuly she still doubted it, as she had not received with delight my projects for departure. I remembered her hesitatiou in replying to me when I broached this snbject. I was too much interested in deceiving myself uot to forge a thousand chimeras. Would it uot suffice to keep my love hidden in the most profound depths of my heart to efface from her mind eveu the shadow of a doubt? And then I would still be permitted to live near her?

Somewhat comforted by these thoughts, I commeuced rebuilding my castles in the air, saying to myself there was always time euough for suffering. The uext day, when the doctor called—

"Doctor," said my godmother, "André spoke yesterday of leaving for England; do you not think it would bo imprudeut to yield too soon to his wishes?"

"A journey!" replied the doctor; "in the name of the faculty I oppose it. You must uot think of it for two or three months."

Gracious heaven! I surprised a flash of joy in Diana's eyes.

XIV.

FROM that day my convalesceuce was rapid. It was harvest time, and the forces of uature in their full maturity seemed to enter into me. I became visibly reanimated. The daily absences of M. de Maufert, all engrossed with his crops, gave us long hours of solitude aud of liberty; sometimes I went out with Diana across the fields to visit the harvesters, and to have seen us sittiug on the sheaves at mid-day, one would have takeu us for two lovers. One day I gathered some bluebonnets and corn-roses and wove a crown which I put upon her hair. She was so beautiful thus that I gazed upon her in an ecstasy of delight; she perceived it and blushed.

A change, however, had come over the atmosphere iu which we were euvcloped. Diana seemed absorbed iu reflection, and I knew that deep dowu in her heart she deliberated ou my fate.

I saw Bastien no more except in the intervals of his hazardous expeditions, for I had not been able to make him give up smuggling. One eveuing I met him.

"Hold, Mousieur André!" said he to me; "I see you in the nick of time; I want to know what you wish that I should say of your bachelor life. Do you know that for fifteen days past Catherine interrogates me, cunning one that she is without appearing so, to know if you are uot making love to some couutry girl, as in other times to Jeanne. I at first thought that it was simply the curiosity of womeu, for there is nothing which interests a womau like these subjects; but she returned to it so often as to puzzle me, and iu my turn I played a little game. She ended by confessiug that Mme. the Countess asked her to make inquiries of me regarding you, because she feared that you might have some unfortunate liking."

"Oh, tell the truth," replied I; bear wituess that I have no low intrigues."

"Enough," replied the smuggler, smiling; "this eveniug you shall be white as snow."

I remained a little disturbed by my rashness, for to exculpate myself thus in the estimation of Diana was again a danger, aud when I saw her in the morning I trembled. By the manner in which she extended me her hand I was reassured. It was easy for me to understand that, relieved from a painful care, she was happy to fear no longer that I was compromising myself by a vulgar liaison unworthy of me.

But aside from my idyl I had a uumber of prosaic vexations caused by the depeudence in which I lived. Nevertheless, I own, since my recovery I had met from M. de Maufert less rudeness, as if he was remorseful for the acts of brutality to which he could uot help attributing the accident which had brought me so ucar the grave. As I had decided to suffer all for the sake of liviug near Diana, I carefully evaded all causes of quarrel. Scarcely six months lay between me and my majority, and the sudden indulgence of my guardiau seemed to presage that I would attain without new storms and outbreaks the ardently desired hour of my emancipatiou. It was necessary that an unexpected chance should come to reveal to me the horrible scheme in progress against me.

One Suuday as I came from Mass, where M. de Maufert always accompauied my godmother, I walked behind theu, separated by the crowd, when, under the porch of the church, I was accosted by Guillot, who said quickly in my ear: "I must speak with you, Mousieur le Baron."

By his air of mystery, I understood that he came to me with something important. "Go aud wait for me at the Saussaie," said I to him, "I will be there in a quarter of an hour."

Since my sickness I had not before seen the farmer; I had only learned from Bastien that, thanks to the intervention of my godmother, the receipt, signed by my uame, had been accepted by the Count.

Arrived at the chateau, I pretended to come home again, and I weut out iu the park to run and rejoin Guillot.

"What has happened you, my frieud?" said I to him; "has Master Placide been again playing his pranks?

"No, Mousieur le Baron," replied he, "they leave me quiet at preseut. Only some things have happeued which it is necessary that you should know, though they have threatened to ruin me if I speak to you of them; but, M. le Baron, your father has done too much for me, and you also, for me to suffer you to come to harm; and the lawyer whom I consulted told me that they wished to ruin you."

"Ruiu me? Explaiu yourself?"

"You have known, Monsieur André, that the day after we went to Monthermé, Mme. the Countess did great kiudnesses for us. I believed myself saved, when, three days afterwards a stamped paper came to us agaiu. The very sight of it threw me into a fit of trembling, without daring to read it. But, hold! here it is; it will explain to you better than I can what other misfortune has fallen upon me.

I expected some sheriff's writ. I had hardly read the first lines when I was thrown into consternatiou. . . . It was an order to appear before an examiuing Judge, coupled with a writ issued from the correctional police at the request of M. Placide. M. Placide couplained "of violence exercised on him by one named Guillot, with the intention followed by the effect to extort several things to his profit." It spoke further of undue influence of a minor whose mental faculties were notoriously weakened, which could be proved by the renewal of an irregular lease torn by assault from M. Placide, who denied all complicity, and asked ten thousand francs damages.

At this reading I became so pale that Guillot thought that I was going to faint. "Continue," said I, attempting to contain my anger; "I wish to know to what lengths they have pushed their baseness!"

"Seeing myself threatened with the law," replied M. Guillot, "I lost my wits: the paper spoke of prison. My wife told me it was necessary to go at once and consult a lawyer. I went to Montherme by night, for I was afraid of being arrested. One of my cousins advised me to apply to M. Isidore, a sheriff's clerk, very well up in chicanery. I related to him my trouble, and showed him the writ. As soon as he saw it, the practiced man began to laugh, saying, 'Everybody knows that! the Maufert business! If you will give me ten francs I will immediately remove this thorn from your foot, and breathe to you the means of lessening the price of your lease, for in reality all this is not bad for you.' My cousin advised me to have confidence; I drew two pieces of a hundred sous each from my bag, and M. Isidore put them in his pocket. 'My good man,' said he to me, 'you are presumptuous in imagining that they persecute you. You are only the bit of string while you think you are the jumping-jack. It is not you that they oblige to dance, and I am going to predict to you, without being a sorcerer, what will happen: You will present yourself before the examining judge, he will interrogate you; the next day M. Placide will withdraw his complaint and the game will be made.' M. Isidore then recounted to me that this affair was a scheme against you; that the complaint had for its aim only to establish that you are—in short that your mind is deranged—because the Count wishes to make you an interdict. The next day I came to Maufert to tell you all this, but they told me you had suddenly fallen sick."

There are some catastrophes so brutal that one has not time to appreciate them, some afflictions so sharp that they remove feeling from you. I recalled the warning of M. Abraham, and, notwithstanding what Guillot revealed to me, it seemed to me so odious, so cruel, so unfeeling, that I yet hesitated to believe it.

"What happened afterwards?" said I.

"Nothing much," replied Guillot; "for the day of my being called before the Judge, when I presented myself at his chambers the officer told me that the suit was continued, and since then I have heard nothing of it."

In the conflict of ideas which ran riot in my mind, I believed for a moment that I was really becoming mad; I thanked Guillot. I felt that this was the decisive hour of my life, and I wished to meditate before acting.

During part of the day I wandered in the woods, struggling against legions of sinister fears. They had dared to declare me mad! Sometimes anger blinded me—it made me thirst to tear my guardian and his miserable steward to pieces with my avenging hands; but I said to myself that they would see in this chastisement a proof of my madness. Me, a madman! This word pursued me, and I found it again at the end of all I planned. I was declared mad if I submitted to the outrage in silence—mad if I avenged myself! Should I go before a tribunal to plead for my right?

Giddy, weeping, it seemed I had lost all perception of reality; I observed myself curiously, looking to find some indications of madness; I put myself to counting the trees one by one, to prove to myself that the sacred fire of my intellect was not extinguished in the diabolical night of imbecility.

I met in my walks some groups of joyous peasants who were going to a fete in the village; all knew me—old people, boys, and girls. They saluted me as they passed. The sight of their joy irritated me. I got away from them immediately, but I had no sooner reflected on this strange fit of misanthropy than I thought I saw in it a symptom of madness. Diana! Diana! I cried in despair. And with all the strength of my soul I tried to absorb my thoughts in that name, as if it had been for me the word of salvation.

THE ART OF TYING THE CRAVAT.—A book that would have delighted Brummel, if it did not distract him, has lately been published in Paris. A correspondent says of it:

My curiosity was so much roused by the announcement of the fifteenth edition of The Art of Tying the Cravat, I could not refuse to buy it. I find ("there are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy") that there are no less than forty-seven different ways of tying the cravat. One is Ladvocat's way; (Ladvocat was the great publisher of his day; he brought out de Chateaubriand's, Victor Hugo's, and de Lamartine's earlier works; he made a great deal of money, met with reverses of fortune, and sank down society until he became box-opener at one of the minor theatres; he died in a hospital and his body was thrown in the potter's field;) another is Byron's way; this is Talma's; that is valise-like; a fifth is giraffe-wise; a sixth is horse-collar-like; a seventh is shell-like; an eighth gastronomical; a ninth is the lazy way; and so on till the forty-seventh way was reached. A grave omission is made in the volume; (although it takes care to tell how Napoleon always wore two cravats, the under and broader one white, the upper one black, so that he seemed to wear a black cravat with a white border; the only day on which he wore a white cravat was at Waterloo;) the omission would be unpardonable were the work translated and published in English, for were a man of moderate circumstances of fortune to give many hours to this book he would a little sooner or a little later find his neck itching for the knot a la Jack Ketch.

BEAU WILSON.

TOWARDS the end of the reign of William III., London society was puzzled by the appearance of a young aspirant to fashionable fame, who soon became the talk of the town from the stylo in which he lived. His house was furnished in the most expensive manner; his dress was as costly as the most extravagant dandy could desire, or the richest noble imitate; his hunters, hacks, and racers were the best procurable for money; and he kept the first of tables, dispensing hospitality with a liberal spirit. And all this was done without any ostensible means. All that was known of him was, that his name was Edward Wilson, and that he was the fifth son of Thomas Wilson, Esq., of Keythorpe, Leicestershire, an impoverished gentleman. Beau Wilson, as he was called, is described by Evelyn as a very young gentleman, "civil and good-natured, but of no great force of understanding, and very sober and of good fame." He redeemed his father's estate, and portioned off his sisters. When advised by a friend to invest some of his money while he could, he replied, that however long his life might last, he should always be able to maintain himself in the same manner, and therefore had no need to take care for the future.

All attempts to discover his secret were vain; in his most careless hours of amusement he kept a strict guard over his tongue, and left the scandalous world to conjecture what it pleased. Some good-natured people said he had robbed the Holland mail of a quantity of jewelry, an exploit for which another man had suffered death. Others said he was supplied by the Jews, for what purpose they did not care to say. It was plain he did not depend upon the gaming table, for he never played but for small sums—and he was to be found at all times, so it was not to be wondered at that it came to be believed that he had discovered the philosopher's stone.

How long he might have pursued his mysterious career, it is impossible to say: it was cut short by another remarkable man on the 9th of April, 1694. On that day, Wilson and a friend, one Captain Wightman, were at the Fountain Inn, in the Strand, in company with the celebrated John Law, the originator of the Mississippi scheme, who was then a man about town. Law left them, and the Captain and Wilson took coach to Bloomsbury Square. Here Wilson alighted, and Law reappeared on the scene; as soon as they met, both drew their swords, and after the first pass the Beau fell wounded in the stomach, and died without speaking a single word. Law was arrested, and tried at the Old Bailey for murder. The cause of the quarrel did not come out. Law declared the meeting was accidental; but some threatening letters from him to Wilson were produced on the trial, and the jury believed that the duel was unfairly conducted, found him guilty of murder, and he was condemned to death. The sentence was commuted to a fine, on the ground of the offence amounting only to manslaughter; but Wilson's brother appealed against this, and while the case was pending a hearing. Law contrived to escape from the King's Bench, and reached the Continent in safety, notwithstanding a reward offered for his apprehension. He ultimately received a pardon in 1719.

Those who expected Wilson's death would clear up the mystory attached to his life, were disappointed. He left only a few pounds behind him, and not a scrap of evidence to enlighten public curiosity as to the origin of his mysterious resources.

While Law was in exile, an anonymous work appeared which professed to solve the riddle. This was The Unknown Lady's Pacquet of Letters. published with the Countess of Dunois' Memoirs of the Court of England (1708,) the author or authoress of which pretends to haved derived her information from an elderly gentlewoman, "who had been a favorite in the late reign of the then she-favorite, but since abandoned by her." According to her account, the Duchess of Orkney (William III.'s mistress) accidentally met Wilson in St. James's Park, incontinently fell in love with him and took him under her protection. The royal favorite was no niggard to her lover, but supplied him with funds to enable him to shine in the best society, he undertaking to keep faithful to her, and promising not to attempt to discover her identity. After a time, she grew weary of her expensive toy, and alarmed lest his curiosity should overpower his discretion, and bring her to ruin. This fear was not lessened by his accidental discovery of her secret. She broke off the connexion, but assured him that he should never want for money, and with this arrangement he was forced to be content. The "elderly gentlewoman," however, does not leave matters here, but brings a terrible charge against her quondam patroness. She says that, having one evening, by her mistress's orders, conducted a stranger to her apartment she took the liberty of playing eavesdropper, and heard the Duchess opening her strong-box and say to the visitor, "Take this, and your work done, depend upon another thousand and my favor forever!" Soon afterwards poor Wilson met his death. The confidante went to Law's trial, and was horrified to recognize in the prisoner at the bar the very man to whom her mistress addressed those mysterious words. Law's pardon she attributes to the lady's influence with the King, and his escape to the free use of her gold with his gaolers. Whether it was founded upon fact, it is impossible to determine.

THE DUMAS, "PERE ET FILS."—The Paris correspondent of the Publisher's Circular says:

Of all young creatures, M. Alex. Dumas the elder is the youngest. He actually looks younger than he did when I last saw him two years ago. The other night he was at the Bouffes Parisiens, laughing more heartily than anybody in the theatre at the extravaganza played. What a contrast he presents to his son! The latter seems the head of the family. He has taken the miscarriage of his last play deeply to heart; although his father told him, "Alexandre, it is your best work and worst piece." He has cancelled his contract with Messrs. Michel Levy Freres, and refuses to have it printed. They were to give him $1,000 for the first edition. He has declared in a letter, which has appeared in the newspapers, that he will never write another play. A dicer's oath!

AN ANECDOTE OF THE "HERD LADDIE."

A BELIEF in ghosts and fairies, and other kindred apparitions which frighten frail mortals by their unearthly practices, is still rooted in the minds of a large portion of the population of Scotland; and though the light of modern science has tended greatly to bring the evidence upon which the ghost-seeing theories rest into disrepute, still, among the rural population, and particularly in remote and mountainous districts, the knowledge which among the better educated classes accounts for all such wonders as the effects of natural causes, or as illusions of the mind, has made no sensible progress. The following story, which we can vouch for on the best authority, as it came from the hero himself, shows that some of our countrymen in the south of Scotland are not less tenacious than others in the west and north of the popular belief on such subjects: James Wylie, the celebrated draught-player, alias the "Herd Laddie," was, not long ago, crossing the hill of Moffat, in pursuit of his (then) calling as an itinerant hawker. It was a very dark and stormy night in midwinter, and the war of elements soon became such as to make man and beast cower. Anxious to find the shelter of any roof, Wylie betook himself, with all convenient speed, to the nearest habitation, which was a decent farm house. He knocked at the door, was at once admitted, and the people of the house treated him with great kindness and hospitality, directing him to dry his drenched clothes at the kitchen fire, and make himself comfortable for the night. At the fireside were two men, who appeared keenly engaged at draughts. The stranger for a while looked modestly on, and the players having concluded a game, which they considered ended in a "draw," asked the silent onlooker if he could do anything to draughts. "On ay, I ken a little o't," was the unpretending reply. "Weel," said one of them, "if you like to try your hand, you may tak a while o't; but mind, we aye play for 3d. a game—maybe you winna venture on't gin ye dinna ken muckle about it." "I dinna mind muckle, I'll try't," answered the other. "Fegs, lad, and gin ye would tak tent o' your siller, you'll do nae sic a thing," said the honest gudewife to the stranger; "for," continued she, "thae twa chaps are the best at it in this countra-side, and canna get their match." "Ou, I dinna mind muckle, I'll try't," was still the rejoinder. So the stranger set to in his own quiet way, and his opponent, reckoning on an easy victory, began to "move," with an arch smile, quite confident of success. But somehow the stranger won, and, having tried each chap alternately, continued to win every game, till, to the amazement of the whole house, he had disburdened them of some 20 shillings. The money was put down with the most scrupulous exactness, and the gudewife, for reasons which will afterwards appear, joined with the rest in demanding, with much concern, "if a' was paid," and would not be satisfied until she knew that such was the case. Supper was then brought in at a late hour, and the stranger invited to partake. During the meal, Wylie's natural taciturnity was not once interrupted, but the most profound silence prevailed, and the inmates exchanged with one another looks of the most solemn and mysterious import. After supper the stranger went out, and the night continuing dark and stormy, he stumbled on a stone, and fell, making a thundering noise, and scaring away a black cat, which made a speedy retreat through the window. Wylie, after a few minutes, returned, but, to his surprise, found the doors bolted and secured. He knocked again and again, but in vain; there was no answer; all within was as still as the grave. At last he looked in at the window, and found the whole family on their knees, evidently engaged in solemn devotion. He waited a reasonable time, then knocked louder than before, but to no purpose; every one continued in the same unvarying posture. Amazed and confounded, he saw no alternative but to seek shelter elsewhere. Returning the same way some months afterwards, he called at the house, and expressed surprise at being so mercilessly shut out on such a stormy night, after having been treated with so much kindness. "Losh man, if you be a man, wha are ye?" interrogated the dame, with great concern; "we thocht you was the deevil! When you gaed out at the door, our Betty saw ye flee up i' the air; and a blaze o' fire cam' frae your heels." The truth now flashed on the mind of the astonished draught-player. "My name," said he, "is James Wylie; I fell at the door, and maybe my tackety shoon struck sparks out o' the staens." "My certy," said the gudewife, "we thocht there was something no canny about ye. There was ne'er a game played i' this house sin syne." Had Wylie never returned to disclose his human identity, there can be no doubt the traditions of the family at the farm-house would have been long enriched by at least one memorable tale of a supernatural visitant.

DOWN ON SHAKSPEARE.—The wealthy mayor of a well-known town in Blankshire became patron of the theatre under Mr. M——y's management in 1850, and gave a hundred guineas for a box for the season. This liberality did not arise from any particular taste for dramatic literature, or any other kind of literature; but he paid thus handsomely for the box because he was a liberal man, liked going to the play, and his predecessor in office paid the same sum, and he would not be outdone. He attended every night, was always pleased and friendly with the manager, till one night Mr. M——y made his appearance in Hamlet, a play the mayor had never seen; and when, in the mad scene "Hamlet" appeared with his dress in disorder the mayor took offence at the exhibition, and declared to his wife and family who were in the box with him, his conviction that the actor was drunk, and he would have no such things doing if he could help it. So, accordingly, he went round to the stage and waited at the side till the end of the scene, when he thus addressed the tragedian: "Mr. M——y, till to-night I looked upon you as a respectable man, and now I see you are given to drink, for no sober man would go before a respectable audience with his shirt hanging about like that, and his stockings down! Why, you ought to be ashamed of yourself." The tragedian, astonished at the ignorance of his patron, said, "My dear sir, you are quite mistaken, I assure you. I only adhere to the author's instructions in respect to show—" "Who wrote this play?" demanded the mayor. "Good God!" exclaimed M——y, "Don't you know Shakspeare wrote it?" "I can't say that I do," replied the mayor, "but I will take care that he writes no more for this house as long as I have anything to do with it, and so you may tell him."

NEVER DESPAIR!

NEVER despair! the day may frown its sternest
And give thee labor—more than seems thy share,
But the still night brings thee the rest thou earnest,
And puts aside the garments of thy care;
Sleep, like a wayside inn, waits for the weary,
Welcoming the tired brain, and the aching feet;
The hearth-stone of our dreams is never dreary,
For by its fires our best-beloved meet.

Never despair! if old friends seem to leave thee,
Giving new friends the love that once was thine;
Let not the largesse of a broad heart grieve thee,
Love universal is the love divine.
Nor jealous be—for as a wild vine throwing
Its tendrils greenly out from tree to tree,
So is the vast love, bountiful and glowing,
In some great souls, for all humanity.

Never despair! or fill thy heart with trouble—
For Gold or Fame—if low thy lot, or poor;
Thou canst not take with thee Fame's opal bubble,
Or bear a grain of gold beyond Death's door.
Thou canst have Peace—the cup of Power is bitter,
And brings but disappointment and unrest;
Thou canst have Love—and gold hath never glitter
To buy one throb of a true, tender breast.

Never despair! life hath so much of glory,
The star-bright skies, the beautiful, fair flowers,
Dear eyes and lips to tell Love's old sweet story,
Glad children laughing through the sunny hours;
And when at Autumn all the blossoms wither,
And life seems gone to ruin and decay,
God's holy ministers shall guide thee thither,
Into the promised land—the perfect day.

EMILIE.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

LA TRAVIATA, on Thursday night, gave Miss Richings ("Violetta") a chance to display the dramatic capabilities of her voice without the continual bruit which belongs to the difficult role she creditably sustained in Ernani on the preceding night. Although La Traviata is inferior in breadth and force to Il Trovatore, and contains too many hints of the latter opera, and altogether too much of Verdi, it is replete with pathos—a quality to which Miss Richings gave most excellent expression with voice and gesture. Her singing, appearance and acting in the dying scene were marred by no infelicity of detail, and had much of the effect contemplated by the composer.

After Verdi and Italian libretto, English dialogue and easy cantabile effects constitute the pleasant change by which we are to come to The Bohemian Girl this evening. A full rehearsal of this opera was given on Friday morning, in which the new tenor, Mr. Hill; the basso, Mr. Peakes; and the baritone, Mr. Seguin, participated. Rehearsals do not always give a fair test of the quality of the performer's voice, particularly previous to début before a strange audience, for which most singers save their voices, and it was quite impossible to fairly criticise their extent or quality. Mr. Peakes' voice is a fine bass organ, and Seguin and Hill sang with much artistic grace and effect. The chorus seemed really admirable, and most of the concerted pieces were achieved with a precision which bespeaks much for the first representation.

Not chosing to comply with the requirements of the Sunday law implicitly, but willing to compromise on a middle ground, a series of sacred concerts has been arranged at the Academy of Music, the initial one to be given to-morrow night. Paul Julien is also under engagement to Mr. Maguire. This young artist's matinée on Wednesday drew out a fashionable audience, and certainly he drew music from the violin which few thought the instrument capable of. Miss Richings was in excellent voice also, and won the plaudits of the house and repeated encores. The concert last evening was fully attended, and Julien surprised his audience by getting more melody out from one string than ordinary artists could from twenty. Miss Richings sang Wha'll be King but Charlie? in a style that brought down the house repeatedly.

Maguire's Opera House has been doing a tolerable business during the week with The Colleen Bawn, Mr. Wheatleigh in his excellent character of "Danny Mann." In this piece a new and rather pretty débutante made her appearance, as "Anne Chute," but without giving promise of ever reaching a very exalted position in the dramatic profession. Mrs. Edwin sustained her favorite role of "Eily O'Connor"—Agnes Perry taking the part on the occasion of the military visit of inspection to the theatre. The correspondence published between Manager Maguire and General McDowell, and the fact that the latter was to be present with his staff at the performance on Wednesday evening, had the effect of filling the house; but we are not certain that a repetition of the attraction would prove equally successful. A great apathy seems to prevail at present among theatre-goers—all the places of amusement in town having scarcely one good large audience among them, while the Metropolitan plays to a scarcely perceptible parquet and an infinitessimal dress circle. Pure Gold has been reproduced at the Opera House by Mr. Wheatleigh, a somewhat sensational play, but one which has not proved what is termed a drawing one. This afternoon The Colleen Bawn will be played for the entertainment of the select circle that goes out on these occasions; and this evening, Watts Phillips' new sensation drama of Paul's Return will be produced.

John Brougham's last effect, Bel Demonio, is in active preparation, and is shortly to be produced with all the accessories of scenery, music and costume which have won the manager an established reputation for liberality. Bel Demonio has been played at the East recently with great success. It is said to be an adaptation of Boucicault's Pope of Rome.

NEW BOOKS.

NOTWITHSTANDING the war, the work of book-making goes bravely on, and the presses of the East seem to be as busy as ever they were in peace times. This proves that all the paper resources of the country are not devoted to the manufacture of cartridges and greenbacks, and that lead finds other shapes than that into which it is cast by bullet-moulds. When types are melted down and our soldiers wad their muskets with the uncut pages of books and periodicals, the war will have assumed serious proportions, indeed.

Not content with printing new books, the ambitious publishers are reproducing editions of works which our grandfathers read in our youth from shelves that had already groaned under their weight for generations. Thus, prominent among the books which Roman sends us this week we have a new edition of The Pilgrim's Progress, printed on tinted paper, and bound in that neat style which of late years is becoming the rule. It is rather late in the day to attempt a criticism of the work, but strange memories come over the mind as we turn over its pages. There was a time when Christian lived and breathed for us, when we believed in Giant Despair, and saw in Apollyon a reality, and not an allegory. Oh, the hours we have spent with Christian on that weary journey, floundering with him through the Slough of Despond, and fording the River on the banks of which stood the Shining Ones who welcomed the pilgrim to the City. And the chivalrous Mr. Greatheart, who was brought to our mind the other day by reading in the papers that a Mr. Greathouse was to be sent to the East in chains, though the only similarity between the two characters is found in the name! But the charm of the book, to our fancy, lay in the fight between Christian and Apollyon. There was a picture of this righteous wrestling-match in the old volume from which we read the story, and the skill of the artist challenged our admiration. The book says of Apollyon: "Now the monster was hideous to behold; he was clothed with scales like a fish, (and they are his pride;) he had wings like a dragon, feet like a bear, and out of his belly came fire and smoke; and his mouth was as the mouth of a lion."

The artist was faithful to the text. Apollyon, in the picture, was one of the scaliest monsters ever man looked on, while Christian was only a man of moderate size, ignorant apparently of gymnasiums, and not up in the mysteries of cut-and-thrust, as practiced at the schools of the present day. But he brought Apollyon, though, when, disarmed, and even "while Apollyon was fetching of his last blow, thereby to make a full end of this good man. Christian nimbly stretched out his hand for his sword, and caught it, saying: 'Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy! when I fall I shall arise;' and with that gave him a deadly thrust which made him give back, as one that had received his mortal wound," after which, "Apollyon spread forth his dragon's wings, and sped him away; that Christian for a season saw him no more." A wonderful tinker that John Bunyan was!

Among the new books which Roman sends, we find President Lincoln's Administration, by Henry J. Raymond, of the N. Y. Times. We have seen this book alluded to as a "campaign volume," and the author in the preface modestly disclaims all profession of making his book, in any exact and important sense, a history of the Administration. But he has given us a valuable book of reference, containing incidentally the clearest and most comprehensive digest of the McClellan campaign which we have yet seen. Mr. Raymond has a happy faculty of grasping his subject by the right end, and to this his success in journalism is due. We venture to say that were a hundred editors assembled in editorial rooms late at night, when important news of a battle or of some Governmental measure came in, news upon which it was necessary that an editorial should be written at a moment's notice, it would be safe to bet that of the hundred articles written, Mr. Raymond's would be the one which a judicious committee would select for publication. He sees a thing quickly, and he writes quickly and to the point. It is a pity that he does not devote himself to some important literary work outside his profession, and give us a history or something else that by no construction can be called a "campaign volume."

Of the late Thos. Starr King we have a memorial in Patriotism and Other Papers. The papers forming the book have been previously published, but as they appeared in periodicals mainly sustained and read by the supporters of a particular religious sect, they will be new to the public. Turning over the pages of the volume we are reminded of Mr. King by the simplicity and earnestness of the diction, and the healthiness of every sentiment; morbidness and bitterness were strangers to his nature. He wears in this book the same smile for his readers that he carried with him into the pulpit, the lecture room, and society. But we miss the magnetism of his voice and the eloquence of his great, loving eyes, and we turn sorrowfully from the printed words to our memories of the living man, "sorrowing most of all that we shall see his face no more."

"Gail Hamilton," one of the most charming essayists that ever sparkled through the pages of any periodical, gives us a neat little volume from the press of Ticknor & Fields, which she christens Stumbling Blocks. "Gail Hamilton," as all our readers probably know, is a woman, and a sensible one. She has a profound disrespect for humbug of every kind, and never seems so happy as when running a tilt against some popular prejudice or stupidity. If suddenly asked what the present volume consists of, we think we should define it as a series of religious essays written in a rather irreverent manner. We do not use the word irreverent in its bad sense; we simply mean that our authoress approaches her subjects with as few preludes as she would use if she proposed to write about a bonnet or a bootee, and handles them livelily and brusquely, dismissing all that nasal drawl and turgid English which the generality of talkers and writers think necessary to bring to the field when religion is the theme. Miss Dodge is a part and parcel of the Atlantic, but she should find a broad welcome on the Pacific.

"Ik Marvel" has given us another charming book from the quiet and retirement of his Edgewood retreat. He calls the book Seven Stories, and builds it up in the same quiet, fanciful style with which he wove the Reveries of a Batchelor and Dream Life, putting in an introduction by way of basement, and a little half-story for the attic—but Attic salt is stored all through the volume. The stories have no connection with each other, not even as much as a flight of fancy, let alone a flight of stairs; but they may be taken up separately and read independently—the seven just suggesting themselves as sufficient to fill up the evenings of a whole week.

We have novels among our new books, too—lots of novels. First comes The Woman in Black, advertised as a companion to The Woman in White, but not by Wilkie Collins. The Woman in Black is written by the author of The Man in Gray, and whether that author is woman or man we do not know, though some slight incoherencies and improbabilities in the plot lead one to suppose that it is the former. The story opens like one of the real sensational school. A pale, slender young woman, rather good looking than otherwise, with a scar on her throat, is introduced to us in the chamber of a dead marchioness. The young woman is trying on the jewels of the dead lady and murmuring an intention of marrying the son. And so a long avenue of crime and sorrow and suicide and all that is opened up to the discerning mind. Having read the first chapter, one will be very apt to read the book through, for the firm of Wood & Braddon have here found a formidable rival. We expect to see a dramatization of The Woman in Black, for it furnishes abundant material for the stage, with its heroes and villians, and the eventual triumph of suffering virtue.

Woodburn, a novel, is written by Rosa Vertner Jeffrey. The story is a pleasant one, and the plot is creditably worked up, though the denoument seems scarcely sufficient. In Darkness and Daylight, by Mrs. Mary J. Holmes, we have one of those stories of home and the domestic relations to which this authoress is peculiarly given. There is nothing in it to shock or surprise, and the admirers of the Wood and Braddon house will probably fall asleep over its quiet pages; others who are not fond of sudden plunges and deluges and daggers, will read the book as they loll quietly over their lotus leaves, and call it capital. Cousin Phillis is one of the Harpers' library of select novels, printed in pamphlet form—a bright, lively story, of reasonable length, and worth the time its reading would occupy.

Wax Flowers, and How to Make Them, is a work we know nothing about and shall not attempt to review. With a wax nose we would feel tolerably well at home; with a wax rose, not. But the author seems to be master of his subject, and instructs his readers in the art of making every flower and vegetable that grows, from camelias to cabbages. There is not a fruit nor a berry nor a flower for the making of which he does not give the most implicit directions. So that if the flowers of literature should prove insufficient for our support, we have serious intentions of attempting flowers of wax for a livelihood. The author tells us how to make wax flowers; why does he not tell us how to make money wax?

In addition to the books above mentioned, Roman & Co. have Our Mutual Friend, Dickens's last serial, neatly published in parts; and of other books more than we have time just now to mention.

MADAME TALLEYRAND AND DENON.—It is said of Madame Talleyrand that one day her husband, having told her that Denon, the celebrated traveller, was coming to dinner, bade her read a little of his book upon Egypt, just published, in order that she might say something civil to him upon it, adding that he would leave the volume for her on his study table. He forgot this, however; and Madame, upon going into the study, found a volume of Robinson Crusoe on the table instead, which, having read very attentively, she was not long in opening upon Denon, at dinner, about the desert Island, his manner of living, etc., to the great astonishment of poor Denon, who could not make head or tail of what she meant. At last, upon her saying, "Ah, dear Friday!" he perceived she took him for no less a person than Robinson Crusoe.

DR. O. W. HOLMES having been prevented, by illness, from delivering a lecture, wrote an apology, in which he said: "I am satisfied that if I were offered a $50 bill after my lecture I should not have strength enough to refuse it."

As it is man's destiny to be ruled by woman, he should, for his own sake, render her as fit for the task as possible.

THE BAYONET CHARGE.

HARK to the batteries disputing in thunder—
Shell over tree-tops and shot rattling under,
Noisily cover the path of the foe
Down through the forest aisles, lofty and large,
There's a look on the face of our leader I know,
And I wait the dread order, "Fix bayonets—charge!"

Am I less brave for a moment's quick shiver?
Hearts of oak yonder bear light leaves that quiver.
I look down the line—there's a lip turning white,
Set the firmer for that; there are fixed gazing eyes
Intent upon something, but not on the fight;
There's a swift glance flung upward to pierce the blue skies.

While the thunder rolls nearer, distinct through it all
I catch fragments of whispers, as, "Boys, if I fall;"
Or thus, "Should the worst come, write home to my mother;"
"Tell my sister, my wife, that I died like a man."
"You'll find in my knapsack, friend," murmurs another,
"A line that I scrawled when the battle began."

Our Colonel sits firm; with that look in his eye,
Like a sword part unsheathed, he rides gallantly by,
Should he fall, made a mark for the sharpshooter's aim
By his gay epaulette with its golden encrust,
There'll be trumpet-loud voices to herald his fame—
But I am a private—the commonest dust!

For fame do I fight? Lord of Hosts, does not he
Who battles for right ever battle for Thee?
There are graves trodden level that love seeks in vain,
Held in honor by angels. Alike in thy sight
The poorest who carves for the red stripes their stain,
And the leader who falls in the van of the fight.

They are coming—they come! Shifting sunbeams reveal
Their way through the leaves by the glitter of steel.
They swarm to the light, through the tree boles they swarm,
Out from the forest aisles, lofty and large,
Our Colonel turns pale, drops his beckoning arms,
But hark, boys, the order, "Fix bayonets—charge!"

MR. BANTING'S PARASITE.

A GENTLEMAN formerly corpulent, but reduced of late by a certain course of treatment within moderate bounds, has been so good as to publish a pamphlet describing the means by which the deliverance was accomplished. "Of all the parasites," he begins, "that affect humanity, I do not know of, nor can can I imagine, any more distressing than that of Obesity; and, having just emerged from a very long probation in this affliction, I am desirous of circulating my humble knowledge and experience for the benefit of my fellow-men." Nothing can be more meritorious than this, particularly when we take into account the fact that he has circulated them gratis. No less than two editions of the Letter on Corpulence, the second edition consisting of 1,500, copies have been given away to the British public. A third edition has just been issued, at sixpence a copy, and therenpon we take the opportunity of noticing this singular production; since it would have been impossible to look at a gift-pamphlet with a critical eye. Even now, it is not our intention to point out any errors; to literary style, Mr. Banting makes no pretence; and therefore, after expressing the wish that he had applied some diminishing process to his sentences, equally efficacious with those directed to his personal physique, we will have done with censure.

The feature that we consider most commendable in our author's character, as evidenced in the present work, is his exceeding courage. He narrates every ludicrous inconvenience that has happened to himself, on account of his great size, with calmness, and even unction, just as the sinner in a tract describes his previous wicked life before conversion. He is fat no longer, it is true, but he has been very fat indeed. He has not been able to tie his own shoe for years. He has been compelled, he says, "to go down stairs slowly backwards to save the jar of increased weights upon the knee and ankle joints." He has puffed and blown with very slight exertion, such as going up stairs. He has probably expressed the wish attributed to the late Mr. Daniel Lambert, "that he might be permitted to see his knees before he died"—a tender aspiration which did not bear fruit, since he might just as well have desired to look upon his ears. Mr. Banting reproves, not without pathos, the natural dispositions of the public to laugh at excessively fat people. Persons thus afflicted are sufficiently burdened already, without having to bear ridicule. If folks must laugh, let them poke fun at the Thin occasionally, for a change. It was no use, he felt, to endeavor to find a channel for his statement in any literary organ. The Lancet, it is not likely, would admit it; first, because medical persons had often tried to reduce Mr. Banting's Parasite and failed; secondly, because the Faculty made light of a gentleman of five feet five inches high weighing upwards of two hundred pounds. They coolly told him that it was one of the attributes and even advantages of advancing years, that one got plumper and plumper annually; that one's circumference should increase like the rings of a tree. However, if he had a fancy for reduction let him, said they, take to muscular exercise, and since he couldn't walk, let him row. Mr. Banting accordingly hired a boat for his parasite, and sculled it about for a couple of hours every morning: and thereby he gained muscular vigor but with it a prodigious appetite, which he was compelled to indulge, and which made him fatter than ever.

He tried sea-air and sea-bathing; he took gallons of physic and liquor potassæ; he rode and he walked; he drank the waters of Leamington, Harrogate and Cheltenham; he "lived upon sixpence a day, and earned it;" and all that came of it was an accession of the Parasite—more fat. He essayed vapor baths and shampooing without benefit; and then Turkish baths, which last had an excellent effect at first, but the improvement did not continue. He took ninety of them whereby he only lost six pounds, and greatly weakened his constitution. Lastly, moderation in diet—what is called "low living"—was prescribed, which soon produced an impoverished state of the system, and boils; "for which last," says the patient, "I was ably operated upon, and fell into increased obesity."

At last Mr. Banting began to grow deaf. He applied to an eminent aural surgeon, who put him to some torture with blisters; but nothing came of them: on the contrary, he fell n to a worse plight than before. However, the eminent aurist left town for his annual holiday, "which," writes Mr. Banting naively, "proved the greatest possible blessing to me, since it compelled me to seek other assistance." He applied to Mr. Hervey of Soho Square, under whose regimen Mr. Banting lost his parasite, and recovered his hearing and everything else. The pamphlet is written to describe how this was done, and how every gentleman who is fatter than he should be may become as slim and genteel as he pleases, by attending to certain simple rules. If Mr. Banting had only made this discovery early enough, there would have been no literary person so highly spoken of by Lord Byron as the author of the Letter on Corpulence. His lordship need not have confined himself so exclusively to gin and water; he might have revelled in the following excellent daily bill of fare, and yet grow thin as a herring: "For breakfast," says Mr. Banting, speaking of his reformed habits, "I now take four or five ounces of beef, mutton, kidneys, broiled fish, bacon, or cold meat of any kind except pork; a large cup of tea, (without sugar or milk,) a little biscuit or one ounce of dry toast.

"For dinner, five or six ounces of any fish except salmon, any meat except pork, any vegetable except potato, one ounce of dry toast, fruit out of a pudding, any kind of poultry or game, and two or three glasses of sherry, claret or madeira—champagne, port and beer forbidden.

"For supper, three or four ounces of meat or fish, similar to dinner, with a glass or two of claret.

"For nightcap (!), if required, a tumbler of grog, (gin, whisky, or brandy without sugar,) or a glass or two of claret and sherry."

This really seems pretty well, and by no means a starvation regimen; and the dry toast or rusk, we are assured, may without hurt have a table-spoonful of spirit to soften it. Still, there are many things left out of the above list of food permissible which we should much miss. Bread, for instance, must not be touched by the Obese who wishes to become of moderate proportions, nor butter, sugar, milk, beer, nor potatoes. Such had been the simple (and innocent, as he thought) elements of Mr. B.'s existence for years, and they had brought him up to the weight we have described. He had been accustomed, according to his own confession, made at a period of genuine penitence, to take bread and milk for his breakfast, with plenty of milk and sugar and buttered toast; meat, beer, bread, ("of which I was always very fond,") and pastry for dinner; his tea consisted of the same noxious materials as his breakfast; and he generally had a fruit tart or bread and milk for supper. In fact, Mr. Banting had been accustomed to subsist upon starch and saccharine matter in almost every form, and was unconsciously qualifying himself for the Agricultural Show at Islington.

Certainly, it seems singular that none of the scientific persons he consulted previous to Mr. Hervey seem to have reprobated his rather peculiar diet; and indeed we are involuntarily forced to the conclusion that they were ignorant of its fattening properties.

"O that the Faculty would look deeper into, and make themselves better acquainted with the crying evil of Obesity—that dreadfully tormenting parasite on health and comfort! Their fellow-men might not descend into early premature graves, as I believe many do, from what is termed apoplexy; and certainly would not, during their sojourn on earth, endure so much bodily, and consequently mental infirmity."

This apostrophe of Mr. Banting's, if somewhat tautological, is certainly not without reason. What a number of guineas must have been exacted under false pretences from his unwilling pockets before he received Mr. Hervey's simple recommendation of a meat diet! Of its ameliorating and rapid results, we have the fullest details. On the 26th of August, 1862, Mr. B. and his parasite together weighed 202 pounds. On the 7th of September, he had lost two pounds; on the 27th, three more; on the 19th of October, four pounds; on the 9th of November, three more; and so on to the 26th of August in the following year, when he found himself relieved of 46 pounds of superfluous fat! Listen to his own touching account of this reduction:

"My girth is reduced round the waist, in tailor phraseology, twelve and a quarter inches, which extent was hardly conceivable even by my own friends, or my respected medical adviser, until I put on my former clothing over what I now wear. * * * * * I am told by all who know me that my personal appearance is greatly improved, and that I seem to wear the stamp of good health. * * * * * I have lost the feeling of occasional faintness, and what I think a remarkable blessing and comfort is, that I have been able safely to leave off knee-bandages, which I have worn necessarily for twenty past years." Also, "being now able to stoop with ease and freedom, I have left off using boot-hooks." The great "charm" and comfort in the system is, he says, that its effects are palpable within a week of trial, which creates a natural stimulus to persevere for a few weeks more, when the fact becomes established beyond question.

The song of gratitude and joy into which Mr. Banting bursts upon getting rid of his Parasite, has nothing to match it in literature for enthusiasm combined with matter of fact. The only composition that approaches it is the series of grateful reflections indulged in by Robinson Crusoe upon finding himself safe upon his island. He seems to have been with difficulty persuaded not to express himself in verse.

"I have not felt so well as now for the last twenty years.

"Have suffered no inconvenience whatever in the probational remedy.

"Am reduced many inches in bulk, and thirty-five pounds in weight in thirty-eight weeks.

"Come down stairs forward, naturally, with perfect ease.

"Go up stairs and take ordinary exercise freely without the slightest inconvenience.

"Can perform every necessary office for myself.

"My sight is restored, my hearing improved.

"My other bodily ailments are ameliorated—indeed, almost passed into matter of history."

Surely the above canticle, chanted to slow music by a choir of enfranchised fat people—persons who have lost their Parasites—would be exceedingly striking. But Mr. Banting went beyond songs of gratitude. "I have placed a thank-offering of fifty pounds in the hands of my kind medical adviser for distribution among his favorite hospitals, after gladly paying the usual fees, and still remain under overwhelming obligations for his care and attention, which I can never hope to repay. Most thankful to Almighty Providence for mercies received, and determined to press the case into public notice as a token of gratitude." Genuine earnestness and piety such as this deserves to be respected. We make no doubt, although we have no personal experience of the fact, (for being professionally connected with literature, we are not fat ourselves,) that Obesity is sometimes worse than an inconvenience. We are confident that our author is speaking the truth when he says, that "no man suffering under this infliction can be quite insensible to the sneers and remarks of the cruel and injudicious in public assemblies, public vehicles, and the ordinary street traffic; nor to the annoyance of finding no adequate space in a public assembly." We sympathize with him very cordially in his divorce from his Parasite, and the detection of its causes in bread, milk, sugar, etc., "those human beans,"* as he now stigmatizes such condiments. He does not overrate his former calamity, and he is perfectly correct as to its cure. "The remedy may be as old as the hills," he allows, "but its application is certainly of recent date"—the light of the discovery having been so hidden as not to have afforded a glimmer to poor Mr. Banting in his twenty years' search for it, and that in directions where it might be well expected to be found. Jockeys, prize-fighters, pedestrians, have long known something of the advantages of a meat diet for training purposes; but the doctors have never hitherto applied it. Since the publication of this pamphlet, hundreds of persons suffering from obesity have been relieved by adopting its recommendations; and many of them have expressed their gratitude to the author of their deliverance. Mr. Banting is deservedly the most popular writer of the day, with a large—nay, the largest class of the British public. "I deeply regret," says he, perhaps with a secret reference to this fact, "not having secured a photographic portrait of my original figure in 1862, to place in juxtaposition with one of my present form." We cordially echo this sentiment. We should like to have seen Mr. William Banting with his Parasite, and also without it.—Chambers's Journal.

* We thought this was a misprint for "human beings," on the first reading, but our author borrows his image from the dietetics of the horse.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

TO those among us who have made some progress in the study of moral philosophy, it has now, I presume, become sufficiently evident, that morality may exist independently of religious ideas; that the distinction between moral good and moral evil, the obligation to avoid the latter and to cleave to that which is good, are laws as much acknowledged by man in his proper nature as the laws of logic, and which spring as much from a principle within him as in his actual life they find their application.—Guizot.—History of Civilization, Lect. V.

LET us throw open the gates of philosophical investigation as widely and freely as Bacon threw open the gates of physical investigation. Let no one be frightened away from thinking. Let us not imagine we can put truth in jeopardy by examining, thinking and reasoning. Let us not feel ourselves bound to preserve methods, and use forms of speech, merely because they rest on authority. For what we think and say and do we are responsible to God, to conscience, and to truth. With our eye fixed reverently and adoringly upon these eternal authorities, we need not fear that we shall go astray.—Dr. Tappan—A Treatise on the Will.

TO determine the religiousness of a man, the question is not merely—What does he believe? but—Has he been faithful to himself in coming to his belief? It may be possible that a man comes to the conviction of Atheism, but yet has been faithful to himself. It may be that the man believes the highest words taught by Jesus, and yet has been faithless to himself. It is a fact which deserves to be held up everlastingly before men that religion begins in faithfulness to yourself.—Parker.—Sermon on My Ministry.

SOFTNESS and greatness of mind, and likewise community of feeling, justice and liberality are much more in accordance with nature than pleasure, than life, than riches—which things, even to contemn and count as nothing, in comparison with the common good, is the part of a great and lofty soul. Therefore, to take away wrongfully from another for the sake of one's own advantage, is more contrary to nature than death, than pain, than other considerations of the same kind.—Cicero.—De officiis—Book III., ch. v.

IT can scarcely be doubted by those who attentively study, the habits of birds, that they are often guided by real intelligence in the adaptation of their operations to peculiar circumstances. This must be the case: for example, when they make trial of several means, and select that one which best answers the purpose; or when they make an obvious improvement from year to year in the comforts of their dwellings; or when they are influenced in the choice of a situation by peculiar circumstances, which, in a state of nature, can scarcely be supposed to affect them. The complete domesticability of many birds is in itself proof of their possessing a certain degree of intelligence; but this alone does not indicate the possession of more than a very low amount of it: since many of the most domesticable animals are of the humblest intellectual capacity, and seem to become attached to man, principally as the source on which they depend for the supply of their animal wants. But there are certain tribes of birds, especially the parrots and their allies, which possess an extraordinary degree of educability, and which manifest a power of performing simple acts, many of which are quite comparable with those of a child when first learning to talk. This development of the intelligence under the influence of man, and in accordance with his habits, rather than with the original habits of their species, is yet more remarkable in the case of those mammals whose instincts lead them to attach themselves peculiarly to him, and whose powers of reasoning are called forth in adapting themselves to the new circumstances in which they are thus placed. The actions of a dog, a horse or an elephant are evidently the result, in many instances, of a complex train of reasoning, differing in no essential respect from that which man would perform in similar circumstances: so that the epithet "half-reasoning," commonly applied to these animals does not explain the whole truth; for their mental processes are of the same kind with those of man, and differ more in the degree of control which the animal possesses over them, than they do in their own character.—Carpenter.—Human Physiology—§ 781.

THE KALIF OF BALDACCA.

INTO the city of Kambalu
By the road that leadeth to Ispahan,
At the head of his dusty caravan,
Laden with treasure from realms afar,
Baldacca and Kelat and Kandahar,
Rode the great captain Alaù.

The Khan from his palace-window gazed:
He saw in the thronging street beneath,
In the light of the setting sun, that blazed
Through the clouds of dust by the caravan raised,
The flash of harness and jewelled sheath,
And the shining scimitars of the guard,
And the weary camels that bared their teeth,
As they passed and passed through the gates unbarred
Into the shade of the palace-yard.

Thus into the city of Kambalu
Rode the great captain Alaù;
And he stood before the Khan, and said,
"The enemies of my lord are dead;
All the Kalifs of all the West
Bow and obey his least behest;
The plains are dark with the mulberry-trees,
The weavers are busy in Samarcand,
The miners are sifting the golden sand,
The divers are plunging for pearls in the seas,
And peace and plenty are in the land.

"Only Baldacca's Kalif alone
Rose in rebellion against thy throne:
His treasures are at thy palace door,
With the swords and the shawls and the jewels he wore;
His body is dust o'er the Desert blown.

"A mile outside of Baldacca's gate
I left my forces to lie in wait,
Concealed by forests and hillocks of sand,
And forward dashed with a handful of men
To lure the old tiger from his den
Into the ambush I had planned.
Ere we reached the town the alarm was spread,
For we heard the sound of gongs from within;
With clash of cymbals and warlike din
The gates swung wide; we turned and fled,
And the garrison sallied forth and pursued,
With the gay old Kalif at their head,
And above them the banner of Mahomed:
Thus we snared them all, and the town was subdued.

"As in at the gate we rode, behold,
A tower that was called the Tower of Gold!
For there the Kalif had hidden his wealth,
Heaped and hoarded and piled on high,
Like sacks of wheat in a granary;
And there the old miser crept by stealth
To feel of the gold that gave him health,
To gaze and gloat with his hungry eye
On jewels that gleamed like a glow-worm's spark,
Or the eyes of a panther in the dark.

"I said to the Kalif, 'Thou art old,
Thou hast no need of so much gold.
Thou shouldst not have heaped and hidden it here,
Till the breath of battle was hot and near,
But have sown through the land these useless hoards
To spring into shining blades of swords,
And keep thine honor sweet and clear.
These grains of gold are not grains of wheat;
These bars of silver thou canst not eat;
These jewels and pearls and precious stones
Cannot cure the aches in thy bones,
Nor keep the feet of Death one hour
From climbing the stairways of thy tower!'

"Then into this dungeon I locked the drone,
And left him to feed there all alone
In the honey-cells of his golden hive:
Never a prayer, nor a cry, nor a groan
Was heard from those massive walls of stone,
Nor again was the Kalif seen alive!

"When at last we unlocked the door,
We found him dead upon the floor;
The rings had dropped from his withered hands,
His teeth were like bones in the Desert sands;
Still clutching his treasures he had died;
And as he lay there, he appeared
A statue of gold with a silver beard,
His arms outstretched as if crucified."

This is the story, strange and true,
That the great captain Alaù
Told to his brother the Tartar Khan,
When he rode that day into Kambalu
By the road that leadeth to Ispahan.

MME. GEORGE SAND.—The Paris correspondent of the Publishers' Circular says:

There is a rumor abroad that Mme. Sand will quit her old home at Nohant for a residence nearer Paris. Nohant will become the residence of M. Maurice Sand, her son, while she will establish her home at Palaiseau, a beautiful village at the entrance of the picturesque valley of Chevreuse. I am afraid that she may lament the change. Some time since a new boulevard razed the house of one of our well-known novelists. He laid his damages at $40,000, although he was only the tenant of the house. The grounds on which he built this claim were that it would take him one or two or perhaps more years to accustom himself to his new home, which would be so much money lost to him. There are few literary men who have not felt the pernicious effects of a removal from the study where long custom made work seem easy. Surely the study which inspired the Marquis de Villemer and La Mare au Diable, and Francois le Champi must possess no common enchantment. Mme. Sand is so much encouraged by her success in dramatizing the Marquis de Villemer that she has turned her attention to L'homme de Neige to fit it for the stage. We wonder here if she will bring from Nohant all her customs. Her servants are all young girls selected for their beauty; they wait on table with bared arms and low-necked dresses. This would be rather combustible material so near this ardent furnace.

A STORIED SWORD.—Among the curiosities at the Philadelphia Sanitary Fair is a Scottish claymore of extraordinary weight and size, once belonging to Allan MacGaskill, a giant Highlander, 7 feet and 6 inches in length, and weighing 200 pounds. This immense weapon was used with terrible effect in the wars of the Covenanters and Cavaliers, about the year 1690, by Col. Donald MacGregor, of Glengyle, father of the world-renowned "Rob Roy." Mr. Robert MacGregor, a lineal descendant of Rob Roy, made this rare contribution, which is a relic almost out of Scott's famous romance, and certainly out of one of the most interesting portions of Scottish history.

ANNIE AND HER MASTER.

CHAPTER VII.

"DO not expect much from it, my mother—not much fame or praise that will reach me in this world." Herr von Heilmann leaned on the window near his mother's chair, which he had placed on her favorite estrade in the brief wintry sunshine of the afternoon. It was the time of day when he always spent an hour with her. She had been talking of his opera—the labor of the best part of the last fifteen years of his life; a subject of which all the musical public of Wustestadt was talking also, for it was now to be produced very shortly.

"Not that I call it 'music of the future;' to that school I do not, as you well know, belong. Neither do I say that I think it has little merit. Had I thought so, I could not have labored at it as I have done; I would not produce it as I am about to do. But its merit is of a quiet order, consistent and maintained. It is a result of much deep and vivid musical thought, focussed by intense concentration of purpose, and worked out with that 'patience' which one of your favorite French authors says is but another word for genius; and the possession of which is, perhaps, my only claim to the possession of genius. It has few, if any, 'beauties' to become popular in the concert or reception room. The harmony of just balance and fair proportion is not the beauty that will take the public. I have done what I could towards making it a perfect work of art; and having striven so hard, I must have attained to something, though only Heaven knows how far I have fallen short of my ideal. And now, this is my prophecy concerning it—mark, my mother, and see if it prove false—that it will fall flat; be, in fact, as regards its reception by the public, a failure. A few musicians and a few musical critics will recognise 'a something' in it of solid and ingrained merit, and the musical papers—those whose editors have not sworn allegiance to the new school—will here and there timidly suggest for it another hearing, while deploring that the stiff-necked classicality of its composer has hindered him from bowing in anything to the popular taste. So much for its present fate. As years go on it will be given another and another trial; and in the end, when I have long been dead, it will win for itself quiet recognition, and take its place among standard works of acknowledged merit."

"And if, Mr. Gottfried, you expect no more than this, why all the labor of so many years?"

"I have done the work I felt called on to do in the way that it was truest to myself to do it; with the rest I have no concern."

"But if, my son, by a slight concession to the populace, you could have given them a work not beyond the possibility of their comprehension, and yet far enough beyond any practice of their lives to be for them raising and ennobling?"

"Mother, the artist should work only towards his ideal, looking neither before nor after, to the right nor left, straining towards it with every nerve and sinew. God only knows how far short even then he ever falls. As to results, with them he has nothing to do; they are in higher hands."

"You may be right in all, Gottfried; probably you are. I did not expect you to flash out upon the people like a firework and dazzle them half blind; but I had hoped more than you tell me I shall see realized. If it is to be as you say, so best. Only, Gottfried, the old mother feels it a little hard; her heart craves a little glory for her son." Gathering tears choked Frau von Heilmann's voice; they came hardly and stingingly to one who so seldom wept; and at the sight of them her son was greatly moved. Stooping before her, he kissed one hand and then the other, one cheek and then the other, murmuring:

"Mother, my mother, I beg of thee," (Mutter, meine Mutter, ich bitte dich.) The words were nothing; the tone, of such deep and strong tenderness, was everything.

With a fervent blessing she flung her arms round his neck. Then she loosed him, pushed him away. "The old woman grows childish," she said, and resumed her knitting, while he resumed his former position, leaning in the window—savoring the bitterness failure would bring him in her disappointment.

It was some little time before the silence was broken; then it was by Frau von Heilmann asking sharply, "What ails my son?"

While her fingers had plied her needles, soothing him by the familiar click-clack, her eyes had watched his face; and now she saw the contraction of the brow and the twitch of the mouth, which she understood right well.

"What ails my son?" she asked again, as he did not directly turn towards her, or answer. "What did you see? Whom are you watching?"

"The Fraulein Gresham passed down the garden avenue with her friend, the young Englishman of whom I told you."

"Alone with him?"

"Yes."

"You cautioned her, as I bade you?"

"I did."

"Then she's a worthless, headstrong girl."

"Softly, my mother. I am pained by her imprudence, but she is hardly to blame. Fraulein Gruppe drives her to the alternative of choosing between the society of her friend and the observance of foreign conventionalities. A girl too simple, sincere, and pure to be a prude, could hardly hesitate."

"Gottfried, you think she loves him, the young Englishman?" There was a twinkle of amusement in the mother's eye, a suppressed chuckle in her throat.

"I think so. I think, too, mother, that it is well she should. His is a trustworthy face; you may believe I studied it the first time I had the opportunity—that night at the opera: he is her own age, and of her own country. I often pitifully remember her answer once, long ago, when I ventured to ask her, seeing her look sad, was she home-sick; she said she did not know, she felt like it; but she did not see why she should have home-sickness, having no home in this world to be sick for. He will marry her, and take her home. Think of the dearness one's own tongue must have, heard in a foreign land—a dearness communicating itself to whoever hears it. It is hardly likely he will not make her love him. I have much doubt if she would be happy sharing our life, my mother. It seems natural and right that she should pine for her own land and her own people. I am grave and harsh, old enough to be her father, almost; sometimes I think she is afraid of me. It will be best that she should love this young Englishman, and return to her own land."

"And you, my son? It is then with you—as I think the child suspects—[these words hardly audible]—pity, paternal kindness—no more?"

"Your humor is somewhat mocking to-day, mother," Herr von Heilmann returned, with a glance of surprise. "With me and with you it will be as it has always been," he said, sadly. "I have my mother, I have my art; and you, you have your son; it will be with us as it has always been."

"Unless, indeed," said the mother, with a little scornful laugh, "the beautiful widowed Grafiun should forcibly take possession of my son and leave me nothing. Well, Gottfried, the old woman thinks her own thoughts, hopes her own hopes, and waits to see them realized. I shall have a daughter yet, and not a Grafinn!"

"Your temperament is sanguine, mother."

"In that it is most unlike my son's."

A long pause.

Then Herr von Heilmann said, "Both her betrothal and her wedding must take place here, my mother; she has no other friends."

"Both shall take place here, then; if my son wills it, it must be so."

"I think, mother, if she does not come soon to see you, you had better send for her. There are many things of which it will be well that you should talk with her. She does not look well or happy; perhaps, the poor child, she is tormenting herself about her duty."

CHAPTER VIII.—THE END.

A FEW days later, Annie was kneeling before Frau von Heilmann caressing her hands, with the words, "Once again, at last. I thought the time would never come. It was very good of you to send for me; unless you had, I could not have got to you, and it seems so long, so long that I have not seen you."

"But Annchen has found time to walk and take her pleasure with other friends!" the old woman answered, with some asperity. Then she took the small face between her hands, and her tone was softer as she said, "But my little one has not thriven upon her pleasure. What have these eyes been doing, child?" She might well ask; they had wept themselves very dim. "And what has your heart been doing, to make the poor cheeks so wan?"

"Breaking, perhaps," answered Annie, the words seeming to burst out unawares. Just then Herr von Heilmann entered, and Annie sprang up in visible, plainly visible agitation.

"Gottfried will not stay long," said the mother; "he is very busy with the rehearsal—for that he has put off all his lessons; but he means to give you yours here in the evening—that is why I sent for you. The time is short now before the grand event, Annchen, you know."

"Yes," murmured Annchen.

Having seen her seated, Herr von Heilmann took up his usual position, leaning in the window, so appearing as if he had some intention of remaining.

"Fraulein Gresham will honor me by being present on the first night?" he asked, after he had answered a few questions of his mother about the one topic of all importance to her. "The first night may be the last," he added.

Annie was silent.

"You have a correct judgment, a pure taste, and a truthful tongue, Fraulein." He smiled as he named the last qualification. "I shall greatly value your unprejudiced opinion of my work."

"You do not think of being present?" he asked, in a colder tone, as Annie still remained silent. Then she looked up into his face.

"If you will find me any little hole to creep into!" she began, with a flash of enthusiasm. Then she let her eyes fall, and explained in a quiet tone, "Fraulein Gruppe says she cannot possibly find room for me."

She did not tell him that she had offered a year's salary for a ticket, and had, before Basil's departure made her again a prisoner, rambled over the town trying to procure one.

"Of course I have reserved places for my friends," Herr von Heilmann answered, the pleasant light shining in his eyes again. "If you will honor me by accepting tickets for three of these places for yourself and two friends."

"You are too good!" cried Annie; "it did seem so hard not to be able to hear it!" she said, turning to the mother. "But I can only use one ticket. I have no friends. My cousin is gone to England, to be at home at Christmas."

These words, "England," "home," "Christmas," together with the thrill of joy that had been such a revulsion from the other thoughts filling her mind, were too much for Annie today; having uttered them in a choked voice, she burst into tears. There was so much pain in the poor little heart which could not be wept away, that grief such as tears could reach would pour itself out.

"Your cousin has left. You are alone again," Herr von Heilmann said, pityingly. Then, as he saw Annie's tears, and heard her convulsive sobbing, he moved to her side. He restrained himself, however, so far as to do no more than to lay his hand lightly on her head, murmuring "Poor child! poor lonely little one!" Then, with the words, "Comfort her, mother—you best can; be very kind to her," he left the room.

Annie now flung herself at the mother's feet, and buried her face in her lap.

Frau von Heilmann stroked her hair caressingly, but said nothing. It was Annie who first broke the silence. Lifting up her head suddenly, she asked—

"Does he think I am crying because Basil my cousin is gone?"

"It is likely enough he does, my little one."

"No matter," murmured Annie, drying her eyes and trying to choke back her sobs; "perhaps it is better he should think so. But do you think so?"

"Perhaps yes, perhaps no. Tell me, is it so?"

"No, no, no," sobbed Annie. "I began to cry, because—because I am so lonely, so miserable; because I could not help it. The thought of England and home, at this Christmas time, makes my heart sicken and sink. Last Christmas it was different; I had not then lost all. Was it wrong? Are you angry? My crying can do no harm. Is he angry?"

"It pained him, child; it pained Gottfried. If you knew him as I do, if you loved him as I do, you would thiuk that was harm enough."

"I do think so—I will not do it again; bnt——" She paused, theu with a great effort she said, "It was not only to have my lesson that you sent for me to-day—you are goiug to tell me something: but I know it—I think I know it."

"If so, we will speak of something else—of you, of your cousin. He comes back again soon, I suppose—when, child? When he is here again, there must not be so much rambling about together—you must bring him here. Gottfried wishes it. Your friend must uot be a stranger here. And then the betrothal—there must be one in our country fashion. It shall be here; Gottfried says so. He will be to you as father, friend, brother."

"Are you—is he—trying to break my heart?" cried Annie. She sprang up in a blaze of indignation, but it soon passed; she sank down again and moaned. "Forgive me. He is very good; you are very good. It is only I——" She wept again, and so convulsively now that Frau von Heilmann strove earnestly to soothe her.

"My child! my poor little one! speak to me. Trust me, tell me all!"

"I must—I must speak, I must tell you, or my heart will burst," gasped Annie. "Oh, I love him, I love him so dearly, so dearly! I know it; now it is too late."

"Too late," echoed Frau vou Heilmann, and over her face gathered a cloud. She spoke abstractedly as she said, "Too late! I do not suppose it is too late. Patience child. He is gone, you say, but he will write; if he is worth having, he will ask you again. Patience, child. So he asked you, and you refused him; and now he is goue, your heart goes after him; for this I do not see that it need break." In spite of herself, her tone was hard and taunting. After her confession Annie had hidden her burning face; now she raised it, and its perplexity lightened that of Frau von Heilmann

"You speak of your cousin. Is it not so, my child?"

"No," answered Annie. "It is best, perhaps, you should not understand. I ought not to have spoken, but you bade me, and my heart is so full. Let me go uow, and—and—"

She tried to rise, but the old woman's hauds pressing heavily upon her shoulders, held her down.

"You did not speak of your cousin? Tochterchen, is it Gottfried?" The mother bent down, and the last words were whispered in the girl's ear.

"Yes, yes, yes. But I know, oh, I know it is too late. I wish, I wish I had not told you. I hope he will be happy; I will pray to God to make him so. She is so beautiful, and she looks kind and good."

"Of whom are you speaking, you poor child? And what do you mean by 'knowing it is too late?' And if you love Gottfried, who loves you, what are you breaking your poor heart about?"

"Is it not true then. Is it not this you sent for me to tell me? Then, what have I doue? Fraulein Gruppe told me that——"

"That?"

"That your son, my master, would in a few months be married to the Grafinn Rosalie von Thauenwald. That the bethothal was to be at Schloss Thauenwald, on the first day of next year."

"A lie, a cruel lie! It is this the eyes have grown so dim, the checks so wan about. Blessings on them, Annchen mein; his mother has been hard upon you, vexed with you, that you tried him and pained him and would not at once own that you loved him; his mother has been hard upon you. But, Tochterchen, you are, and will be, my Tochterchen. He loves you; not only as you fancied, poor little one, out of pity and kindness, and in the spirit of self sacrifice, does he desire to marry you, but he loves you with all that is best in love. His heart opens and closes with difficulty, my Annchen: somehow you, the little stranger womau, got into it and you are there forever."

"He cares for me, for me! Oh, Mutterchen, are you quite, quite sure?"

'For you, and, in the same way, for no other."

"But—he seemed so ready to give me up, so pleased—what did that mean?"

"Ready he was, pleased even, because he thought you would so be happier. It means that he does not love with the self-seeking passion some men call love, but with a love, the strongest desire of which is the good and happiness of what he loves. Yes, he was ready to give you up, so far as to be to you only a brother, a friend—whatever you most needed. But, as I have said, you are in his heart forever. Oh, he is good, he is noble is my Gottfried. Thank God for his love my daughter."

"Mother, I will. I will, mother. I do, I will—all the days of my life."

"Gottfried!" the mother called, thinking she heard a movement in his room.

Annie buried her face in the mother's lap.

Herr von Heilmann obeyed the summons. Did Annie ever forget how each step of his, as he came towards them, echoed in her heart? What she felt was like dying into another life, she thought—dying from a dull, cold, loveless world, into a world of love.

"Take this child, this little daughter of mine," Frau von Heilmann said. "Take her she has been here long enough. Take her away, I say; she wearies me."

"Mother!"

"Take her away, I say," she reiterated in mock anger, while the tears began to strcam down her face. "She is more yours than mine: why should I have all the burden of her. Take her; she wearies me."

Herr von Heilmann paused beside the little prostrate figure, and perused his mother's face.

"He does not believe his old mother! Tochterchen, look up; speak to him."

Annie looked up: she spoke to him, but only with her eyes; It was enough. He bowed down before his mother; the trembling hands were laid upon their heads: by both that blessing was felt to be the true betrothal.

Afterwards he tried to lift Annie from the ground. First she turned, and, bending low, laid her face upon his feet; afterwards she let him do with her what he would.

Frau von Heilmann nodded approval.

"Right, right, my daughter," she said. "Gottfried, for that you shonld uot chide her. Right, right, Annchen, true daughter of miue. 'A vos pieds et dans vos bras.' When I was a young woman and I was thought to be a right proud one, I set my pride ou this, that no man should ever hold me in his arms whose feet I did not feel that I could kneel and kiss. I did not marry very early. He was rather long in coming—the man towards whom I could feel thus. He did come, however, and he was your father, my son—a father of whom my sou is almost worthy."

* * * * * * *

When Herr von Heilmann's opera was produced, it fared a little better than he had prophesied for it, yet not much. But it was well given, and he saw and heard it with his betrothed bride at his side—his little betrothed bride, whose heart he now kuew to be so wholly aud humbly, so wouderingly his; to whom his love was all-sufficing; who walked softly in the light of the new knowledge of its depth and streugth, feeling that it made all places holy, all life sacred.

To a man the happiness of love cannot, and should not, be all-sufficing as to a woman; yet to Herr von Heilmann it was very full and satisfying, making him feel that he could afford to bear all things, even to the disastrous damuing with faint praise of his timid friends. He was calmly content; not that his work should die and be forgotten, but that it should bide its due time for such recognition from posterity as its intrinsic merit could justly claim; happily not sharing the opinion of the French cynic, who pronounced—"La postérité n'est pas autre chose qu'uu public qui succede a un autre."

* * * * * * *

As for Frau von Heilmann—the little one, as she is called in Wustestadt, happy still to need some such distinctive title—let any who can, doubt of her happiness: the writer of this bit of her story is not one of that number! She is by no means an idle little woman; she is proud to share her husband's labor, happy to know that she lightens it. Annie had played, and played wonderfully well, at that school-concert in her maiden days. Frau von Heilmann has played to larger and more critical audiences, some few times, when he has been incapaciated by sudden attacks of his winter enemy, fulfilling for her husband his engagements to play in public.

Ou one of these occasions the writer of this small portion of her story last saw her. It was a pretty and pleasaut sight; for beside the lovely little child-like woman, whose small fingers did marvels of delicate aud intelligent execution, stood her husband, stiff and soldierlike, following the movements of those fingers with unremitting attention; and when all was over it was to him she turned, looking up into his face with eyes that asked plainly as eyes could speak—"Master, have I done well? Husband, are you pleased with me?" The answer of his face left nothing doubtful. It was easy enough to see how completely Annie was the mistress of the heart of him she still loved, houored and revered as her Master.

THE ABOLITION OF HANGING.

The English House of Commons was recently occupied with a debate upon the death penalty. The Saturday Review says it was "simply a field day for the Quakers, aud for the aspirants who seek an easy notoriety by maintaining paradoxical opiuions," and the same journal characterlstically and ably argues in favor of the death penalty as follows:

The real difficulty with which the Quakers have to contend is, that they have no quid pro quo to offer to society for the risk they invite it to run. That there is a risk, every one feels instiuctively. It may be quite true that the murderers who act from passion are very often not capable, at the moment of their crime, of reasoning calmly enough to distinguish between the terrors of penal servitude and the gallows. Against them the criminal law is necessarily a weak defence. But there are other murderers besides those who act from passion. Naturally, it is the interest of every robber to commit murder. Murder would dispose of the chief part of the evidence against him. Conviction, for instance, upon highway robbery, generally follows from the evidence of the man that has been robbed. A sharp blow on the skull would dispose of such testimony far more effectually than a dozen alibis. The only motive which restrains a robber from taking this precaution is the knowledge that, if he is convicted, it will make the difference to him between death and imprisonment. If, however, it comes to be merely a questiou between one term of imprisonment and another, every man who commits robbery with violence will take care that his violence shall effectually silence the principal witness against him. Some motive of great cogency must be presented to mankind before they can be induced to run the risk of effecting so formidable a change in the calculations of the criminal class. What have the Quakers to offer in return? Jeremy Bentham used to say that the worst use to which you could put a man was to hang him. The apophthegm might have been true in the days of the bloody code. But, if the question is to be argued economically, the truth is now exactly the other way. Far the best use to which you can put the murderer is to hang him. If you shut him up really for life, you incur an enormous cost, besides the horror of the puuishmeut you are inflicting, and which frequently drives men mad. If you let him go, he must betake himself to crime again, for no one would give employment to a convicted murderer. The best that could be hoped from either result of sparing him is, that he should drag out the most miserable life that can be conceived at the greatest possible cost to his fellow-citizens. If he could be restored to a condition of innocence and happiness by a more lenient law, it is possible that mankind might consent, by way of experimeut, to submit to the probability that a few more persons might possibly be murdered in consequence, for the sake of attaining such a result. But the prospect of forming, in some secluded prison, a small community of sulky and despairing maniacs is not an adequate consideration for the risk incurred. Mr. Bright brought forward the examples of two or three American States, and especially those of the great Western States of Michigan aud Wisconsin, to prove that the abolition may be ventured upou without risk. The punishment had been abolished in those States, and the crime, as he alleged, had not increased. But States in which the bounty of nature and the scantiness of population preserve a high average of prosperity among all classes are no fair test. Murders committed to facilitate a robbery are not likely to be common in a community where there are no indigent classes; and it is chiefly against murders of that kind that the law offers a protection. Nor can any conclusion be safely drawn from a country where most people carry arms. Highway robbery is probably a dangerous amusement in the classic land of revolvers.

The advocates of abolitiou construct a curious argument out of the demeanor of the crowd at executions. They go at a great sacrifice, as they assure the House of Commons, to their own personal feelings, and see an execution; and when they get there they discover that the crowd is behaving very much like any other crowd of lower-class Englishmen that have gone to see a sight. They jostle, they shoulder, they laugh, they talk; and as their language is not specially refined for the occasion, but the ordinary language they employ, it naturally strikes their polite censors as "scurrilous and profane." The explorers come back full of the horrors they have seen, and exclaim that executions are demoralizing spectacles, and cannot possibly prevent crime. It would be a curious matter of inquiry what it was these people expected the crowd to do. No doubt an English mob is very far removed from the poetical ideal of a crowd witnessing an affecting spectacle. But you only see ideal crowds upon the boards of a theatre. An execution at the opera would undoubtedly be a much more edifying sight. The men would stand on one side dressed in blue and purple, the women would stand on the other in short tarlatan petticoats, and when the fatal moment arrived they would flop down on their knees, every one stretching out one arm, and singing Io tremo, with variations, to the accompaniment of muffled music. It is certain that if the philanthropic members of Parliament desired some exhibition of horror equally striking on the part of the crowd, they were decidedly disappointed. An English mob is composed of Englishmen, and therefore does not betray feelings either of softness or dismay if it can help it. But the lesson taught to them is just as effective as if their feeling had been demonstrative and uncontrollable. It is perfectly possible to take in the idea that a certain course of conduct will be followed by a premature and disagreeable death without either weeping or looking serious over it. At public schools, public "executions" are part of the discipline of the school, and the spectacle is frequented with great demonstrations of delight by the younger school-boys. But it has never been suggested that the punishmeut loses any of its terror in their eyes because they take pleasure in seeing it inflicted on their comrades. Those who complain of the demoralization of the crowd at an execution miss the point altogether. The gibbet is not supposed to preach either religiou or morality; and no one, therefore, is supposed to learn anything of either from seeing it at work. It teaches not an abstract truth, but a plain fact, which it commends to the attention of all spectators—that if A cuts B's throat, A's neck will be wrung. So long as the crowd appreciate and lay to heart this important fact, it is a point of subordinate importance whether they do or do not spend their time, while they are waiting for the spectacle, in the coarse conversation to which they are used elsewhere. It matters comparatively little whether they are to this extent demoralized, so long as they are effectually deterred. They are admitted to witness executions, not that they may learn holiness or purity, but that they may learn to fear the law. Their demeanor at the time furnishes no sort of indication of the extent to which the sight they are witnessing has inspired them with fear, and therefore is no test of its salutary operation.

A Bitter Morsel.—Within the memory of many of the existing generation, one of the known figures in St. James street, and an assiduous frequenter of its clubs, was the Baron Osten, formerly of the German legion, a gallant officer and estimable man, but of a somewhat lean, dry, and bilious complexion. His claim to distinction consisted in his having had a miraculous escape from the jaws of a lion, who, after mumbling him for a few minutes, let him drop. The jokers maintained that he owed his life to his bitterness; and Sydney Smith, after expatiating in his peculiar vein on the topic, was wont to make it the basis of a theory for curing cannibals of their taste for human flesh. "Send them Rogers," he would say; "and if that does not spoil their relish, try them with J. W. C., for even if they manage to get him down he is sure to disagree with them." The actual adventure, as rescued from obscurity by Miss Wynn, was well worth commemorating, although not quite so much in accordance with the theory as could be wished:

"May 20th, 1827.—We heard again of some bullocks having been killed iu the same jungle where we had killed three lions on the 14th. On the strength of this information we set out immediately, and found a whole family of hons. We killed five, but I had a very narrow escape of being killed by one of them. After having killed four, I had wounded a fifth, and Grant with five pad-elephants was beating towards me, when he roused the wounded lion, who immediately wounded one of the elephants. He then came straight at me. I bent a little forwards over the howdah to take a steady aim at him, when unfortunately the fore part of the howdah gave way, and I fell with all my guns right on the top of the lion, who immediately seized hold of me. I broke my left arm in the fall, and got a severe blow from the lion on the head, which considerably stunned me. I felt, and recollect however, that he was tearing at my right arm, and I never can forget the horrible gnarling noise he made. Grant's and all the other elephants turned tail and ran away, so that I was left alone, helpless, in the jaws of the lion. How I got out of it alive is a miracle, and I cannot account for it otherwise than by believing my Mahout's statement. He says his elephant backed about fifty yards, but that he succeeded after some time in driving her up close to the lion, when she took hold of a young tree and bent it with great force over the lion's back, when he relinquished his prey, and was soon after killed by one of the chickarees, (chasseurs on foot.) When I came to my senses I found my left arm broke, a severe contusion on my head, and eleven wounds from teeth and claws in my right arm."—Diaries of a Lady of Quality, in the Edinburgh Review.

Many of the members of the Society of Arts attended to see a new invention, a carriage to run without horses, with only one wheel. While in the ardor of expectation they were shown—a wheelbarrow.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1864.

THE WEAKNESS AND DIVISIONS OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES IN CALIFORNIA.

PROTESTANTISM is the hereditary creed of a large majority of the citizens of California, and as the presumptive faith of the people, although not the established faith of the State, it is a public matter, and a proper subject for consideration. Why is it, we ask, that this public creed is so badly conducted? that its managers do their work so badly? that instead of treating one another with friendship, mutual helpfulness and fraternal love, each turns his back upon the other? that instead of uniting in one grand, wealthy, influential and growing church, they persist in remaining a multitude of petty, poor, and almost powerless sects, all losing rather than gaining strength with the advance of time?

There are no accurate public records from which we can obtain statistics to show the extent of the evil resulting from these divisions among the Protestants. There are, however, certain notorious facts within the knowledge of every one. While the Catholics act harmoniously on one side, the Evangelical Protestants are all discordant on the other. Who can remember all the sects? There are the Presbyterians—Old School, New School, Campbellites and Cumberland—the Methodists North and South, the Baptists and Seventh-day Baptists, the Congregationalists, the Episcopalians, the Lutherans, the Dutch Reformed, and so forth—all strenuous in maintaining their independent organizations, and excluding everybody that does not adopt the details of their several platforms.

The evils of division are manifold and manifest. The congregations are small, the church buildings poor, the preachers usually ill paid and occasionally incompetent. The Catholics have the finest churches, colleges, female academies, asylums and religious hospitals in the State. The Protestants, as religious organizations, have no property, no wealthy and prosperous benevolent or educational institutions, no grand public buildings. The property of the Catholic Church in San Francisco is worth twice as much as that of all the Protestant sects. Three-fourths of the Protestant churches are covered with mortgages. The small towns are without religious services or preachers. There is no mutual helpfulness. The religious sentiment is weakened by endless jealousies and bickerings. Not one man in ten of the adult male white population is a church member. Not one child in three is baptized. In the cities, there are three times as many attendants on Sunday at dances, theatres, and other public amusements as at churches, and even those who go to church begin to consider their attendance rather a matter of fashion and of policy, than a solemn duty or a necessity for salvation.

The origin of many of these sects is well known. Their founders thought men were not sure of salvation by the creeds and formulas previously used, and concluded that it was necessary to have new platforms. They suspected strongly, if they did not believe implicitly, that everybody out of their Church had only eternal perdition to hope for. For instance: the Baptists found a text which says, "Except ye believe and be baptized ye shall be damned." They looked into the etymology of the Greek word translated "baptized," and into the mode of baptism mentioned in the New Testament, and inferred that unless a man were immersed—or as we say in common English, "ducked"—his chances of a happy immortality were more than uncertain. The Episcopalians assert that there can be no valid baptism except by the priest who derives his authority under successive ordination from the Apostles, and they claim to have that exclusive successorship in their Church; so everybody not within its pale seems ruled out from that beatitude which all men hope to attain. And so of most of the other sects.

But the old prejudices happily are rapidly giving way. People are beginning to think that heaven is not so exclusive a place as was once imagined, and that salvation does not hinge upon trifles in the matter of peculiar belief. It is no longer fashionable—as it certainly never was polite—for the Presbyterian to tell the Methodist that he is sure of eternal perdition. Rival churches have actually come to treat each other as though there were room above for more than one sect as well as upon earth. They have even got so far as a mutual helpfulness in some minor points. When they are too weak to act alone, they act together. They unite in foreign missionary enterprises, in Bible Societies, in Tract Societies, and in Sunday-school Unions. Why can they not unite in their churches?

It is a very easy matter to reply that the Protestant sects in California are connected with others of the same respective sects in the Eastern States, and that they cannot act without the consent of their constituted authorities. This, however, is an empty excuse. The people of California are not mortgaged to those of the East. We have the same rights of independent action that they have. There can be only one justification for a maintenance of the separation, and that is an avowal that the differences of belief are not mere trifles, but are fundamental, and deprive every outsider of the hope of salvation. That is a position which nobody does take or dare take, and the conclusion is that these divisions between the various Evangelical Protestant sects are maintained, not for any good reason, but because of the jealousy of cliques and conflicting personal interests. Would it not be better to sweep away all empty or trivial distinctions and unite all the Protestant churches in one, presenting the same solid and unbroken front to the world that the Catholic Church does, and not suggesting doubt to the querying mind by division?

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

THE June number of Hunt's Merchant's Magazine presents some interesting statements regarding the public debt, and so analyzes the official figures as to show the rate of increase of each class of debt per day at different periods, and also the increase of various kinds of currency. The totals of the statements of the public debt are as follows:

Date.	Int. in paper.	Int. in coin.	No interest.
February 2, 1864...	$219,274,354	$761,305,301	$490,419,355
March 2.....	272,329,760	769,154,251	477,860,235

May 14.....	405,525,023	817,089,112	508,216,790

The aggregate increase of debt was, it appears, from February 2d to May 14th, as follows:

February 2, total debt outstandiag	$1,473,225,724
May 14, total debt outstanding	1,730,870,926
Increase in 102 days	$257,645,212

This increase is at the rate of $2,525,933 per day, or, in round numbers, one thousand millions per annum. It, however, appears to have been irregular. The following table shows the rate of increase at the different periods when official statements had been given:

	INCREASE OF DEBT.
	Days.	Per Day.	Amount Out.
June 30, 1863			$1,098,793,181
September 30, 1863	92	$1,340,000	1,222,113,559
February 2, 1864	123	2,041 000	1,473,225,714
March 2, 1864	29	1,395,000	1,513,702,837
March 15, 1864	13	5,550,000	1,596,999,429
May 10, 1864	55	2,330,000	1,726,248,411
May 14, 1864	4	1,130,629	1,730,870,926

According to the average increase of the 102 days, up to May 14th, the debt on the first of July last, must have been $1,850,081,100.

The mode in which the money has been raised, since February 2d, is shown to be as follows:

One-year Legal Tender Notes	$ 43,000,000
Two-year Legal Tender Notes	130,894,887
Fractional Notes	2,579,633
One-year Six Per Cent. Certificates	9,471,150
Five Per Cent. Deposit Certificates	3,196,239
Total paper issues	$189,141,909
Sales 5-20's	$ 7,775,272
Sales 10-40's	48,925,500
	$ 56,700,772
Increase of arrears	24,713,940
Aggregate increase of debt	$270,556,621

Thus of the whole increase, only $56,700,772 was from sales of permanent stock; the remainder was from issues of paper currency, the increase and importance of which may be better illustrated by the following table of the Government issues of paper money:

	Greenbacks.	5 per cent. Legal Tenders.	Fractions.	Total Legal Tenders.
June 10...	$387,646,589		$20,192,456	$107,839,045
Sept. 3.....	402,737,051		17,776,056	420,503,007
Dec. 1.....	418,245.931		18,010,000	436,255,931
Jan. 1.....	421,836,781	$50,000,000	18,120,000	489,956,781
Feb. 1.....	450,735,004	50,000,000	18,246,290	518,031,294
March 1...	449,119,548	95,507,891	18,745,720	563,373,159
March 15..	449,073,616	130,188,414	19,173,330	598,428,360
April 1....	441,254,280	161,902,950	19,181,240	640,957,856
May 10....	449,013,280	226,894,887	20,547'173	685,696,340
May 14....	441,234,017	223,894,887	20,825,923	685,944,827

Thus, the increase since July last year has been $300,000,000, or $25,000,000 per month, a million per day, and this constitutes about one-half of the aggregate increase of the Government debt. The National Banks have in the same period added about $16,000,000 to the currency, the amount of the new National Bank issues which was in circulation on the 15th ult., being:

Fives	$7,012,000
Tens	8,307,000

This amount is not much towards the authorized $300,000,000 of that description of notes, but in ordinary times it would have been a serious addition. It would appear from these figures, then, that the outstanding currency, one month since, had been increased to $700,000,000, dependent upon the Government action giving an increase of $200,000,000 since the 1st of January last.

Legal Tender notes have ruled in this market during the week at lower rates than ever before, opening on Monday at 43, declining to 37½, sellers' option 30 days, and closing at 38½. At the regular Board, some $25,000 were sold at these rates. Latest telegraphic advices from the East, under date of the 14th inst., quote Gold at 263.

The Stock market exhibits no substantial improvement, and the stagnation prevailing for some time past continues to be a ruling feature.

Gould and Curry rallied early in the week from $1,600 to $1,800, but quickly fell to $1,635 on Thursday, and closed yesterday afternoon at $1,725. Some 100 feet have changed hands within this range.

Ophir advanced to $825 from $725, then receded to $730, and sold last evening at $710.

Savage fell from $1,025 to $950, and closed at $1,040 bid. Belcher declined from $1,050 to $950.

Uncle Sam dropped to $405, the lowest point reached for months past, but is now a shade better.

Challar is in less favor, and declined from $450 to $400; closing at $400 bid.

North American has materially improved, and rose from $56 to $70.

Burning Moscow advanced from $12 50 to $20, then fell to $15, and sold yesterday at $16.

Lady Bryan has dropped from $12 to $8½; large sales taking place.

North Potosi fell from $52 to $44; then sold at $50, (assessment of $12 50, delinquent,) and closed at $58 asked.

Imperial is also lower, and was sold at $142 and $145.

Real Del Monte is down to $13.

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, July 16th, 1864.

I'VE had an affair on my hands during the week, a little matter of a country cousin, that has occupied my time to the exclusion of all business and nearly all other amusements.

She is a nice young girl and lives at Benicia. Once and a while she comes to town, but she doesn't stay long; she thinks it is "a dreadful wicked place," and I don't know that she's much out in her reckoning. For when a town is so wicked that I have serious thoughts of leaving it and taking up a temporary residence at Calistoga Springs, it must be pretty bad, indeed.

My cousin has never been around much heretofore during her visits, owing to the unreliability of the young men about town and the disinclination of my aunt to trust Susan Jane with them; but I'm a proper young man. The shafts of scandal have never been leveled at me; my reputation has never been assailed. Other young men have been seen at the Cliff House or on the Sea Beach of moonlit evenings, with cigars in their mouths and dimity by their sides, but Inigo has never been seen there.

This is not because I only go out on dark nights and after every one else has gone to bed, but because I have arrived at the deliberate conclusion that Virtue is the best policy and honesty its own reward.

That is what the young man said to the Psalmist, adding in a plaintive tone of voice:

Tell me not in mournful measures,
That I drive a rapid team;
Horse-cars are my only pleasures,
And "Things" are not what they seem.

We were at the opera the other evening; of course you saw us, for we were a distingué-looking couple. We occupied front seats in the Dress Circle, and people lorgned us considerably.

I handed Susan Jane my opera-glass that she might look at them in return. She took it and immediately applied it to her nose, sniffing away at it vigorously. I looked on, somewhat curious, wondering whether my fair cousin smelt a rat.

The mystery was explained when she handed me back the glass with "Here, take your darned old smelling-bottle. There isn't any scent into it at all."

She had actually mistaken a glass, which is the pride of my eye and the envy of the town, for a vinaigrette on a large scale. I explained to her the error into which she had fallen, when she naively exclaimed: "La! I thought it was a double-barrelled smelling bottle."

Such is life; and cousins that come from the country are conceitful above all things and desperately peaked!

CAVIARE FOR THE GENERAL.

The following correspondence explains itself. By the date of my letter it will be seen that Manager Maguire borrowed the idea, on which he subsequently acted, from me—my letter to the General being dated the 4th, while Maguire's bears date of the 7th, three days later. He is the Play-giarist of the Period:

Office of The Californian,
San Francisco, July 4th, 1864.

General McDowell:—Dear Sir—The editor and contributors of The Californian having been delighted witnesses of the cordial welcome extended to you upon your arrival in San Francisco by all loyal citizens, and being desirous of making as much out of you as they possibly can, would like to have you visit The Californian office, if at all congenial to your taste or compatible with your convenience.

They are at present successfully publishing a number of continued stories, to which they would call your attention. Prominent among these is a translation of La Comtesse Diane—the story of a young man who disagreed with his godfather and fell in love with his godmother, a reprehensible practice which we trust you will not encourage in your Department. If you would like to hear a little original poetry, "Bret" will be happy to read for your edification a little piece of his own composition, containing some four or five hundred lines. Either this, or any other amusement your inclination may suggest, will be offered you.

Arrangements will be made for your reception and comfort. They have no private boxes to offer you, and no dress circle, but a broad and commodious Way to the Pit is open through the door of all newspaper offices, and the inmates of them sometimes find themselves in the tightest boxes imaginable. They will be happy to supply yourself and staff with back numbers of The Californian, and take your and their subscriptions to that really excellent and valuable journal from date. Greenbacks from all army officers will be taken at par. During your stay in the office you will be permitted to make yourself happy and content, reading "proofs," looking over exchanges, and becoming familiar with all the mysteries of the office, except the one of knowing how the paper manages to pay its debts.

Hoping that the invitation will be accepted, and that you will early become the patron of The CALIFORNIAN, they remain,

Your warm friends and
Obedient servant,
INIGO,
For himself and in behalf of others.

To Inigo:—DEAR SIR—Major-General McDowell directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, offering him and his staff a complimentary reception at your office, and to say that he accepts it with pleasure, and will, if it should seem convenient to you, name the MIDDLE OF NEXT WEEK. Any entertainment that will be agreeable to you and not expensive, will be entirely acceptable to him.

His Excellency, the Governor of the State, and a number of other excellencies, will accompany him on the perilous occasion.

Very respectfully,
Your constant subscriber,
F. HAVEN, Promen-aid-de-camp.

As I have before remarked, the above correspondence explains itself!

Precisely at the appointed hour our visitors arrived. The General brought his scrip and staff with him—the scrip at present is only worth thirty-seven and a half cents on the dollar, and he intends to spend it on the first convenient opportunity. The staff was brought along in compliance with an established custom; generals, like octogenarians, can't walk without a Staff.

Pigeon Wing met our distinguished guests on the threshold, and dropped them an elegant courtesy, proud, as she gracefully remarked, to extend to them the courtesies of the office. She devoted herself at first to the General, but hearing him incidentally allude to his wife and children, went back on him during the remainder of the visit, and flirted with every member of the staff in a way that made "Bret" jealous. He effected an admirable divertisement, however, by asking whether any one had read "Our Trip to Washoe." The best-looking young man of the party, with whom Pigeon Wing before had seemed specially taken, replied that he had not; that the arduous duties of the military profession left him no time to attend to the light and ephemeral literature of the day.

Thereupon Pigeon Wing flounced out of the office, remarking that there was a vein for silver and a place for gold, but that she didn't know of any room for greenbacks in this country; she presumed, too, that none of them had read "Lines to the Ocean," and she had the honor of wishing them all a good morning.

Nothing more was seen of Pigeon Wing that day. "Bret" remarked that he had written a small essay, having for its text The Currency of the Country. He said that he, too, was in Governmental employ, and suffered from the depreciation of the money in which he was paid. He had never explained it before, but he had, in fact, been obliged to move from so many neighborhoods, in consequence of not being able to pay the rent, the landlords having all refused to take greenbacks at par. He intended to have alluded to this in "The Ballad of the Emeu," but it slipped his memory.

The members of the staff discoursed sensibly and feelingly on this subject. Col. Drum said it beat him; another remarked that it was rather Cutting on the boys; and still another said that a Haven in California was scarcely a thing to be wished for, if the present depreciation of paper was destined to continue. Some one then suggested that in this instance Abraham didn't seem to care much whether a Sparrow fell to the ground or not; and so it went on, until Emilie cheered them up by telling them they should "Never Despair," no matter what "Shadows" were projected across their pathway.

Inigo was silent. The duty of treating this distinguished party had been entrusted to him, and he was resolving in his mind to whom he should intrust the still more delicate duty of paying the bill. The General thoughtfully disposed of the question by remarking incidentally that he was a Dashaway, and that the officers of his staff were selected from the original tee-totallers of the country. He refused all refreshments in his and their behalf; said he didn't want any more Pi; hoped to have the pleasure of seeing me at the theatre in the evening, and politely bowed himself out—Pigeon Wing making faces at him as he went down stairs, from her hiding place in the folding-room, in revenge for his not having compelled his command to read her trip to Washoe.

AN APPLE PAIRING.

Lest any may think that I steal the pun which lies dormant in that sub-head, "Apple Pairing," let me explain that it was made common property of at a wedding the other evening; everybody picking it up and using it as original. The credit of it properly belongs to Jo. Clark, who got it off at a wedding the other evening. Mark Sheldon claims it; but just score it down to the account of my friend Clark.

I like to see people get into scrapes that they can't get out of, and so go to all the weddings and other incorporations of joint stock companies that happen in town.

The affair of the other evening was a very jolly one; every one was there, and the wedding was the prettiest of pictures. Indeed, one might call it an Apple of Gold Hill in a picture of silver. All Washoe was there, bringing the golden fruit of the Hesperides and other classical fables to mind. We had Apple-pie and Apple-toddy and Apple-jack, and the worst puns were made and the best humor prevailed that ever was seen. And as for the "female loveliness" that lent smiles to the occasion and smiled on Lent, . . . pardon me, but I will not attempt to paint it until I have a pencil made of sunbeams and dipped in the dew of roses. Pen and ink are inadequate to the task, and I even question whether Pen Johnson could do it justice.

I looked lovely on the occasion, but there were two or three prettier girls there than I. And that made me so unhappy that I stayed very late and drank with all who asked me and danced with some that didn't; the consequence was that I got home very late in the morning and didn't know whether I was a bride or not, and had some trouble in getting up stairs and a slight difficulty with my boots, and some conversation with the door, which I seized by the handle and wished a good deal of happiness too, and that it would never have occasion to regret the step it had taken, and that if it was ever blessed with a family it would bring them up in a way very creditable to him who intended to stand godfather for all, unless the list proved to numerous. The door didn't reply, but a loud and profane inquiry rang through the Occidental upper floor to know who was making all that noise in the hall. A rapidly disappearing coat-tail was seen for a moment, and echo answered INIGO.

FIXING UP AN OLD HOUSE.

WHEN I had secured the possession of my new home, and stood in its doorway, thoughtfully twirling the key in my hand, the words of the retiring tenant struck me with renewed intensity and vigor. "It's a snug little cottage," he had said, confidentially, "and a cheap rent—but it wants to be painted and papered bad." As I looked around it, I could not help thinking that one of these requirements had already been met—that it had been "papered bad," and that its present ragged, torn and dirty walls looked better now than they must have looked in the primal horrors of their original paper. There was something peculiarly provoking about the old pattern, which bore marks of having been picked at here and there as if by exasperated and vicious fingers. But the rent was cheap, and Mr. Chase had said "Economy was the lesson of the times," and as an humble employé of that officer and a recipient of his notes, I could not do better than take the advice and the house, which I did at once.

"Why couldn't you paper it yourself?" asked my wife suddenly, with a gleam of inspiration, "You know that you're—" but she did not proceed any further in this feminine attempt to associate my literary habits with this branch of upholstering, and only said: "You might do it after office hours instead of writing, and you'd save money by it."

The house was not large, and as I could look forward to finishing it within a reasonable time during my leisure hours, I rashly consented to put aside my pen and take up the paint and paste-brush. The choice of paper next occupied and perplexed me for some days; it was odd how critical and fastidious my taste in regard to patterns developed with this first opportunity I ever had to indulge it. After some hesitation I finally selected two kinds, but I had not proceeded far before I discovered that the most charming pattern was extremely difficult to match and involved a waste of material that was as ruinous to my pocket as it was knowingly profitable to the losel knave who sold it to me. This was my first intimation of difficulties. I would willingly pass over the rest. I would like to forget the singular propensity which that paper displayed to entwine itself lovingly in damp curves around my legs, and how I vainly endeavored to evade its chaste and cold embrace as I was putting it on. It is not pleasant to think how I papered one side of the room before I discovered that the pattern was upside down, and how during this time I felt generally of the paste, pasty, and couldn't rid myself of the uncomfortable impression that I was a loaf of bread not quite done. Let me hurry over these things to that day when I found myself standing in abject humility before a paper-hanger whom I had finally been obliged to call in. He was a serious man of about forty, with a becoming pride in his profession. After casting a rapid and supercilious glance around the walls, he approached my paste-bucket, and taking a little of the mixture on his finger, smelt of it, and tasted of it. As he turned away with a pained yet forgiving smile on his fine features, I ventured to humbly ask his opinion of my work. "As a amatoor I've looked at wuss walls nor that," he replied, somewhat vaguely. At any other time I would have been tickled with the idea of an amateur paper-hanger, but I am ashamed to say that my failures had brought me to such a low state of moral dejection that I eagerly seized this miserable straw, and subsequently gave him to understand, in rather general terms, that I was possessed of a singular monomania for paper-hanging; that it was not economy, but love of a noble profession which had incited my work, and that in the language of William Birch, my "parents were wealthy."

I should state here that my labors during that time had been materially assisted by the presence of several white-headed but youthful denizens of the neighborhood, who, having at first watched my progress by flattening their snub noses against the window, finally grew bolder and came in and out of the house and assisted me in removing the old paper, scattering it far and wide through the streets, and also otherwise proffered their assistance and learned to address me by name, and to whom I offered a kind of providential excitement in the reaction which followed the fierce festivities of the Fourth.

My ill success in papering did not, however, deter me from my original resolution of painting the house. Accordingly, I procured what seemed to me to be an extraordinary quantity of white lead, and, armed with two brushes, seriously set myself to work. Here my progress was marked with complete success. It was evidently a more scientific and higher profession than my previous one, and I reflected with satisfaction that it was next to frescoing—and what was Michael Angelo but a fresco painter? Yet I could not help noticing that, although the paint looked white when it was first applied, it gradually faded out and permitted primal stains to appear—"damned spots" that would not "out"—and that singular drops—pearly tears—broke out along the joints and panels of the doors. Finally, when the whole wood-work had taken to weeping, I was forced—I write it with shame—to call in a painter—a remarkably polite man—who praised my mechanical dexterity, but informed me courteously that in mixing the color I had omitted some important ingredient. This I had remedied somewhat by the extra quantity of paint I had used. "It's nothing—nothing—a mere trifle; an accident that frequently occurs," he remarked, with genuine good breeding. "It will take a week or two longer to dry, that's all; and then you can give it another coat;" and bowed himself out of my presence. I may support his assertion by stating that it still exhibits a wonderful humidity and stickiness, sufficient to retain incautious visitors in the position they often assume in leaning against it, and that I keep a small sponge and turpentine constantly on hand against accidents. In the mean time there is a mild suggestion of its presence in the odor that fills the house—an odor that is not unhealthy, as my polite painter assures me he has worked in it for fifteen years and never found it even disagreeable.

The usual effect of partial renovation gradually developed itself in my new house. Each improvement threw into new and unexpected relief some defect which otherwise might have passed unnoticed. Thus, new paper rendered fresh paint an imperative necessity. Presently I discovered that the doors wanted fixing and the windows new weights, and that a carpenter was required. As a friend had recommended to me a workman whom he described as a "good fellow and the very man I wanted," I engaged him at once.

He certainly was a good fellow. Our terms of agreement were that he should superintend the work, and I should render him such assistance as lay in my power. Having entered heartily into all my plans and the difficulties of my situation, he began his arduous duties by an animated and desultory conversation in which he delivered an account of his past life and history. Digressing easily and gracefully into the present topics, he gave me his opinion of the war and described the situation before Richmond by a diagram drawn on a board with a piece of chalk. Before we had definitely settled the success of Grant it was high noon, and declining his invitation to drink with him, I took the opportunity while he was absent at lunch, to drive a few nails and plane off the top of a door. When he returned we continued our conversation by the aid of more diagrams, until nightfall when we had put up two shelves, driven half-a-dozen nails, and used up all our chalk. The assistance I rendered him was not clearly definite. I think it amounted to handing him nails when required, and bringing him tools out of his chest. But he was a very good fellow. When we parted at night he assured me that he liked to work for a gentleman that was quiet and sociable-like, and promised to bring me a newspaper containing some lines written on the death of his cousin's child by scarlet fever. He charged me, I think, $5, but he was a clever fellow, and we got along together very well; and I am now seriously considering whether I shall not employ him in fitting up my next new house.

DISGUSTED—NOT DISCOURAGED.—The Howler thinks that the editor of the CALIFORNIAN "has got tired bucking at the Howler"—is "discouraged." True, with a qualification. We wouldn't like to buck for any length of time against a pole-cat if we accidentally stirred one up, but disgust would have more to do with driving us from the field than discouragement. The Chinese style of warfare is not in accordance with the usages of courage or civilization. We reprint an article from the Nevada Gazette quite in the Howler's style; these two papers can have the further discussion of each other's merits entirely to themselves.

THE Camanche is to be put up immediately, the City having pledged its credit to the contractors for $60,000. Vigorous preparations are being made to commence the work of building and push it to a speedy completion.

THE Grand Jury of Solano county has indicted Capt. Poole of the Yosemite for assault with intent to commit murder in running into the Washoe. The man injured by the collision is in a fair way of recovering.

MR. and MRS. Charles Kean (the latter will be remembered as Miss Ellen Tree) are expected to arrive in this city under engagement to Manager Maguire.

NEW MUSIC.—Mr. Gray sends us An Hour at the Cliff, the music by W. D. Corrister and words by Walter Bray. The engraving of the cliff and ocean beach, by Nabl Brothers, which forms the frontispiece, is better than either words or music. We fear that Walter will never attain eminence as a poet, though he is a very popular minstrel.

PAPERS RECEIVED.—White & Bauer have our thanks for Public Opinion, the Saturday Review and Notes and Queries, which the last steamer brought and which they furnished us.

A GLIMPSE OF CALIFORNIA THROUGH NEW YORK SPECTACLES.

THE Atlantic for June contains an article entitled Seven Weeks in the Great Yosemite, from the pen, probably, of Fitz Hugh Ludlow, whose last summer's visit to this coast, in company with Bierstadt, the artist, will be remembered by our readers. We make the following excerpts:

IN PRAISE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

It is as hard to leave San Francisco as to get there. To a traveller paying his first visit it has the interest of a new planet. It ignores the meteorological laws which govern the rest of the world. There is no snow there. There are no summer showers. The tailor recognizes no aphelion or perihelion in his custom; the thin woollen suit which his patron had made in April is comfortably worn until April again. The only change of stockings there is from wet to dry, or from soiled to clean. Save that in so-called winter frequent rainfalls alternate with spotless intervals of amber weather, and that soi-disant summer is one entire amber mass, its unbroken divine days concrete in it, there is no inequality on which to forbid the banns between May and December. In San Francisco there is no work for the scene-shifter of Nature; the wealth of that great dramatist, the year, resulting in the same manner as the poverty of dabblers in private theatricals—a single flat doing service for the entire play. Thus, save for the purpose of notes-of-hand, the Almanac of San Francisco might replace its mutable months and seasons with one great kindly, constant, sumptuous All the Year Round.

Out of this benignant sameness what glorious fruits are produced! Fruit enough metaphorical; for the scientific man or artist who cannot make hay while such a sun shines from April to November must be a slothful laborer indeed. But fruit also literal; for what joy of vegetation is lacking to the man who every month in the year can look through his study-window on a green lawn, and have strawberries and cream for his breakfast—who can sit down to his royal fruit, and at the same time to apricots, peaches, nectarines, blackberries, raspberries, melons, figs both yellow and purple, early apples, and grapes of three kinds?

Another delightful fact of San Francisco is the Occidental Hotel. Its comfort is like that of a royal home. There is nothing inn-ish about it. Remembering the chief hotels of many places, I am constrained to say that I have never, even in New York, seen its equal for elegance of appointment, attentiveness of servants, or excellence of cuisine. Having come to this extreme of civilization from the extreme of barbarism, we found that it actually needed an exertion to leap from the lap of luxury, after a fortnight's pleasaunce, and take to the woods again in flannel and corduroys.

After a kind mention of the friends he found here, and an honest tribute to the one who is dead, an account is given of the preparations which the traveller Yosemite-wards makes; and we learn that

WOMEN WHO ENTER THERE LEAVE HOOPS BEHIND.

No Saratoga affair, this! A total lack of tall trunks, frills, and curling-kids. Driven by the œstrum of a Yosemite pilgrimage, the San Francisco belle forsakes (the Western vernacular is "goes back on") her back-hair, abandons her capillary "waterfalls" for those of the Sierra, and, like John Phœnix's old lady who had her whole osseous system removed by the patent tooth-puller, departs, leaving her "skeleton" behind her. The bachelor who cares to see unhooped womanhood once more before he dies, should go to the Yosemite. The scene was three or four times presented to us during our seven weeks' camp there—though the trip is one which might well cost a feeble woman her life.

The travellers, mounted on mules, depart four or five miles from the direct Yosemite track and visit

THE BIG TREES.

Before reaching Clark's we had been astonished at the dimensions of the ordinary pines and firs, our trail for miles at a time running through forests where trees 150 feet high were very common and trees of 200 feet by no means rare, while some of the very largest must have considerably surpassed the latter in measurement.

But these were in their turn dwarfed by the Big Trees proper, as thoroughly as themselves would have dwarfed a common Green Mountain forest. I find no one on this side of the continent who believes the literal truth which travellers tell about these marvellous giants. People sometimes think they do, but that is only because they fail to realize the proposition. They have no concrete idea of how the asserted proportions look. Tell a carpenter, or any other other man at home with the look of dimensions, what you have seen in Mariposa county and his eye grows incredulous in a moment. I freely confess, that, though I always thought I had believed travellers in their recitals on this subject, when I saw the trees I found I had bargained to credit no such story as that, and for a moment felt half-reproachful towards the friends who had cheated me of my faith under a misapprehension.

Take the dry statistics of the matter. Out of 132 trees which have been measured, not one underruns 28 feet in circumference; five range between 32 and 36 feet; 58 between 40 and 50 feet; 34 between 50 and 60; 14 between 70 and 80; 2 between 80 and 90; 2 between 90 and 100; 2 are just 100; and 1 is 102. This last, before the storm truncated it, had a height of 400 feet. I found a rough ladder against its trunk—for it is prostrate—and climbed upon its side by that and steps cut into the bark. I mounted the swell of the trunk to the butt and there made the measurement which ascertained its diameter as 34 feet—its circumference 102 feet plus a fraction. Of course the thickness of its bark is various, but I cut off some of it to a foot in depth and there was evidently plenty more below that.

To make some rough attempt at a conception of what these figures amount to, suppose the tree fallen at the gable of an ordinary two story house. You propose to cross by a plank laid from your roof to the upper side of the tree. That plank would perceptibly slope up from your roof-peak. Through another tree, lying prostrate also, and hollow from end to end, our whole cavalcade charged at the full trot for a distance of one hundred and fifty feet. The entire length of this tree before truncation had been about three hundred and fifty feet. In the hollow bases of trees still standing we easily sheltered ourselves and horses. We tried throwing to the top of some of them with ludicrous unsuccess, and finally came to the monarch of them all, a glorious monster not included in the above table of dimensions, as most of those measured are still living, and all have the bark upon them still, while the tree is to some extent barked and charred. When it stood erect in its live wrappings, it measured forty feet in diameter—over one hundred and twenty in circumference! Estimates, grounded on the well known principle of yearly cortical increase, indisputably throw back the birth of these largest giants as far as 1200 B. C. Thus their tender saplings were running up just as the gates of Troy were tumbling down, and some of them had fulfilled the lifetime of the late Hartford Charter-Oak when Solomon called his master-masons to refreshment from the building of the Temple. We cannot realize time-images as we can those of space by a reference to dimensions within experience, so that the age of these marvellous trees still remains to me an incomprehensible fact, though with my mind's eye I continue to see how mountain-massy they look, and how dwarfed is the man who leans against them.

A flower called the "Lady Washington," the only fragrant one they found in the valley, is compared to a snowy day-lily, with an odor of tuberoses. Standing on what they christen "Inspiration Point," our travellers have a view of

THE WONDROUS WALLS OF THE VALLEY.

We stood on the verge of a precipice more than three thousand feet in height—a sheer granite wall, whose terrible perpendicular distance baffled all visual computation. Its foot was hidden among hazy green spiculæ—they might be tender spears of grass catching the slant sun on upheld aprons of cobweb, or giant pines whose tops that sun first gilt before he made gold of all the valley.

There faced us another wall like our own. How far off it might be we could only guess. When Nature's lightning hits a man fair and square, it splits his yard-stick. On recovering from this stroke, mathematicians have ascertained the width of the valley to vary between half a mile and five miles. Where we stood the width is about two.

I said a wall like our own; but as yet we could not know that certainly, for of our own we saw nothing. Our eyes seemed spell-bound to the tremendous precipice which stood smiling, not frowning at us, in all the serene radiance of a snow-white granite Boodh—broadly burning, rather than glistening, in the white-hot splendors of the setting sun. From that sun, clear back to the first avant-courier trace of purple twilight flushing the eastern sky-rim—yes, as if it were the very butment of the eternally blue Californian heaven—ran that wall, always sheer as the plummet, without a visible break through which squirrel might climb or sparrow fly—so broad that it was just faint-lined like the paper on which I write by the loftiest waterfall in the world—so lofty that its very breadth could not dwarf it, while the mighty pines and Douglas firs which grew all along its edge seemed like mere cilia on the granite lid of the Great Valley's up-gazing eye. In the first astonishment of the view, we took the whole battlement at a sweep, and seemed to see an unbroken skyline; but as ecstacy gave way to examination, we discovered how greatly some portions of the precipice surpassed our immediate vis-a-vis in height.

First, a little east of our off-look, there projected boldly into the valley from the dominant line of these a square stupendous tower that might have been hewn by the diamond adzes of the Genii for a second Babel-experiment, in expectance of the wrath of Allah. Here and there the tools had left a faint scratch, only deep as the width of Broadway and a bagatelle of five hundred feet in length; but that detracted no more from the unblemished four-square contour of the entire mass than a pin-mark from the symmetry of a door-post. A city might have been built on its grand flat top. And, oh! the gorgeous masses of light and shadow which the falling sun cast on it—the shadows like great waves, the lights like their spumy tops and flying mist—thrown up from the heaving breast of a golden sea! In California at this season the dome of heaven is cloudless; but I still dream of what must be done for the bringing out of Tu-toch-anula's coronation-day majesties by the broken winter sky of fleece and fire. The height of his precipice is nearly four thousand feet perpendicular; his name is supposed to be that of the Valley's tutelar deity. He also rejoices in a Spanish alias—some Mission Indian having attempted to translate by "El Capitan" the idea of divine authority implied in Tu-toch-anula.

Far up the Valley to the eastward there rose far above the rest of the sky-line, and nearly five thousand feet above the valley, a hemisphere of granite, capping the sheer wall, without an apparent tree or shrub to hide its vast proportions. This we immediately recognized as the famous To-coy-æ, better known through Watkins's photographs as the Great North Dome. I am ignorant of the meaning of the former name, but the latter is certainly appropriate. Between Tu-toch-anula and the Dome, the wall rose here and there into great pinnacles and towers, but its sky-line is far more regular than that of the southern side, where we were standing.

We drew close to the edge of the precipice and looked along over our own wall up the valley. Its contour was a rough curve from our stand-point to a station opposite the North Dome, where the valley dwindles to its least width, so that all the intermediate crests and pinnacles which topped the perpendicular wall stood within our vision like the teeth of a saw, clear and sharp-cut against the blue sky. There is the same plumb-line uprightness in these mighty precipices as in those of the opposite side; but their front is much more broken by bold promontories, and their tabular tops, instead of lying horizontal, slope up at an angle of forty-five degrees or more from the spot where we were standing, and make a succession of oblique prism-sections whose upper edges are between three and four thousand feet in height. But the glory of this southern wall comes at the termination of our view opposite the North Dome. Here the precipice rises to the height of nearly one sheer mile with a parabolic sky-line, and its posterior surface is as elegantly rounded as an acorn-cup. From this contour results a naked semi-cone of polished granite, whose face would cover one of our smaller Eastern counties, though its exquisite proportions make it seem a thing to hold in the hollow of the hand. A small pine-covered glacis of detritus lies at its foot, but every yard above that is bare of all life save the palæozoic memories which have wrinkled the granite Colossus from the earliest seethings of the fire-time. I never could call a Yosemite crag inorganic, as I used to speak of everything not strictly animal or vegetal. In the presence of the Great South Dome that utterance became blasphemous. Not living was it? Who knew but the débris at its foot was merely the cast-off sweat and exuviæ of a stone life's great work-day? Who knew but the vital changes which were going on within its gritty cellular tissue were only imperceptible to us because silent and vastly secular? What was he who stood up before Tis-sa-ack and said: "Thou art dead rock!" save a momentary sojourner in the bosom of a cyclic period whose clock his race had never yet lived long enough to hear strike? What, too, if Tis-sa-ack himself were but one of the atoms in a grand organism where we could see only by monads at a time—if he and the sun and the sea were but cells or organs of some one small being in the fenceless vivarium of the Universe? Let not the ephemeron that lights on a baby's hand generalize too rashly upon the non-growing of organisms! As we thought on these things, we bared our heads to the barer forehead of Tis-sa-ack.

I have spoken of the Great South Dome in the masculine gender, but the native tradition makes it feminine. Nowhere is there a more beautiful Indian legend than that of Tis-sa-ack. I will condense it into a few short sentences from the long report of an old Yosemite brave. Tis-sa-ack was the tutelar goddess of the valley, as Tu-toch-anula was its fostering god—the former a radiant maiden, the latter an ever-young immortal—

"Amorous as the mouth of May."

Becoming desperately fascinated with his fair colleague, Tu-toch-anula spent in her arms all the divine long days of the California summer, kissing, dallying, and lingering, until the valley tribes began to starve for lack of the crops which his supervision should have ripened, and a deputation of venerable men came from the dying people to prostrate themselves at the foot of Tis-sa-ack. Full of anguish at her nation's woes, she rose from her lover's arms, and cried for succor to the Great Spirit. Then, with a terrible noise of thunder, the mighty cone split from heaven to earth—its frontal half falling down to dam the snow-waters back into a lake, whence to this day the beautiful valley-stream takes one of its loveliest branches—its other segment remaining erect till this present, to be the Great South Dome under the in memoriam title of Tis-sa-ack. But the divine maiden who died to save her people appeared on earth no more, and in his agony Tu-toch-anula carved her image on the face of the mile high wall, as he had carved his own on the surface of El Capitan—where a lively faith and good glasses may make out the effigies unto this day.

THE WATERFALLS.

Just before I started after supplies our party moved its camp to a position five miles up the valley beyond Camp Rosalie, in a beautiful grove of oaks and cedars, close upon the most sinuous part of the Merced margin, with rich pasture for our animals immediately across the stream, and the loftiest cataract in the world roaring over the bleak precipice opposite. This is the Yosemite Fall proper, or, in the Indian, "Cho-looke." By the most recent geological surveys this fall is credited with the astounding height of twenty-eight hundred feet. At an early period the entire mass of water must have plunged that distance without break. At this day a single ledge of slant projection changes the headlong flood from cataract to rapids for about four hundred feet; but the unbroken upper fall is fifteen hundred feet, and the lower thirteen hundred. In the spring and early summer no more magnificent sight can be imagined than the tourist obtains from a stand-point right in the midst of the spray, driven, as by a wind blowing thirty miles an hour, from the thundering basin of the lower fall. At all seasons Cho-looke is the grandest mountain-waterfall in the known world.

While I am speaking of waterfalls, let me not omit "Po-ho-nó," or "The Bridal Veil," which was passed on the southern side in our way to the second and about a mile above the first camp. As Tis-sa-ack was good, so is Po-ho-no an evil spirit of the Indian mythology. This tradition is scientifically accounted for in the fact that many Indians have been carried over the fall by the tremendous current both of wind and water forever rushing down a cañon through which the stream breaks from its feeding-lake twelve or fifteen miles before it falls. The savage lowers his voice to a whisper and crouches trembling past Po-ho-nó; while the very utterance of the name is so dreaded by him that the discoverers of the valley obtained it with great difficulty. This fall drops on a heap of giant boulders in one unbroken sheet of a thousand feet perpendicular, thus being the next in height among all the valley-cataracts to the Yosemite itself, and having a width of fifty feet. Its name of "The Bridal Veil" is one of the few successes in fantastic nomenclature; for, to one viewing it in profile, its snowy sheet, broken into the filmy silver lace of spray and falling quite free of the brow of the precipice, might well seem the veil worn by the earth at her granite wedding—no commemorator of any fifty years' bagatelle like the golden one, but crowning the one-millionth anniversary of her nuptials.

Our last camp was pitched among the crags and forests behind the South Dome—where the Middle Fork descends through two successive waterfalls, which, in apparent breadth and volume, far surpass Cho-looke, while the loftiest is nearly as high as Po-ho-nó. About three miles west of the Domes, the south wall of the valley is interrupted by a deep cañon leading in a nearly southeast direction. Through this cañon comes the Middle Fork, and along its banks lies our course to the great "Pi-wi-ack" (senselessly Englished as "Vernal") and the Nevada Falls. For three miles from our camp opposite the Yosemite Fall the cañon is threaded by a trail practicable for horses. At its termination we dismounted, sent back our animals, and, strapping their loads upon our own shoulders, struck nearly eastward by a path only less rugged than the trackless crags around us. In some places we were compelled to squeeze sideways through a narrow crevice in the rocks, at imminent danger to our burden of blankets and camp-kettles; in others we became quadrupedal, scrambling up acclivities with which the bald main precipice had made but slight compromise. But for our light marching order—our only dress being knee-boots, hunting-shirt, and trowsers—it would have been next to impossible to reach our goal at all.

But none of us regretted pouring sweat or strained sinews, when, at the end of our last terrible climb, we stood upon the oozy sod which is brightened into eternal emerald by the spray of Pi-wi-ack. Far below our slippery standing steeply sloped the walls of the ragged chasm down which the snowy river charges roaring after its first headlong plunge; an eternal rainbow flung its shimmering arch across the mighty caldron at the base of the fall; and straight before us in one unbroken leap came down Pi-wi-ack from a granite shelf nearly 400 feet in height and 60 feet in perfectly horizontal width. Some enterprising speculator, who has since ceased to take the original seventy-cents' toll, a few years ago built a substantial set of rude ladders against the perpendicular wall over which Pi-wi-ack rushes. We found it still standing, and climbed the dizzy height in a shower of spray, so close to the edge of the fall that we could almost wet our hands in its rim. Once at the top, we found that Nature had beeu as accommodating to the sight-seer as man himself; for the ledge we landed on was a perfect breastwork, built from the reeeding precipices on either side of the cañon to the very crown of the cataract. The weakest nerves need not have trembled, when once within the parapet, on the smooth, flat rampart, and looking down into the tremendous boiling chasm whence we had just climbed.

Above Pi-wi-aek the river runs for a mile at the bottom of a granite cradle, sloping upward from it on each side at an angle of abont 45 degrees, in great tabular masses slippery as ice, without a crevice in them for 30 yards at a stretch where even the scraggiest manzanita may catch hold and grow. This tilted formation, broken here and there by spots of scanty alluvium and stunted pines, continues upward till it intersects the posterior eone of the South Dome on one side and a colossal castellated precipice on the other—creating thus the very typical landscape of sublime desolation. The shining barrenness of these rocks, and the utter nakedness of that vast glittering dome which hollows the heavens beyond them, cannot be conveyed by any metaphor to a reader knowing only the wood-crowned slopes of the Alleghany chain.

Climbing between the stunted pines and giant blocks along the stream's immediate margin—getting glimpses here and there of the snowy fretwork of churned water which laced the higher rocks, and the black whirls which spun in the deep pits of the roaring bed beneath us—we came at last to the base of "Yo-wi-ye," or Nevada Fall.

This is the most voluminous, and next to Pi-wi-ack, perhaps the most beautiful of the Yosemite cataracts. Its beauty is partly owing to the surrounding rugged grandeur which contrasts it, partly to its great height (800 feet) and surpassing volume, but mainly to its exquisite and unusual shape. It falls from a precipice the highest portion of whose face is as smoothly perpendicular as the wall overleapt by Pi-wi-ack; but invisibly beneath its snowy flood a ledge slants sideways from the cliff about a hundred feet below the crown of the fall, and at an angle of about 30 degrees from the plumb-line. Over this ledge the water is deflected upon one side and spread like a half-open fan to the width of nearly 200 feet.

At the base of Yo-wi-ye we seem standing in a cul de sac of Nature's grandest labyrinth. Look where we will, impregnable battlements hem us in. We gaze at the sky from the bottom of a savage granite barathrum, wheuce there is no escape but to return through the chinks and over the crags of an Old-World convulsion. We are at the end of the stupendous series of Yosemite effects; 800 feet above us, could we climb there, we should find the silent causes of power. There lie the broad, still pools that hold the reserved affluence of the snow-peaks; thence might we see, glittering like diamond lances in the sun, the eternal snow-peaks themselves. But these would still be as far above us as we stood below Yo-wi-ye on the lowest valley-bottom whence we came. Even from Inspiration Point, where our trail first struck the battlement, we could see far beyond the Valley to the rising sun, towering mightily above Tis-sa-ack herself, the everlasting snow-forehead of Castle Rock, his crown's serrated edge cutting the sky at the topmost height of the Sierra. We had spoken of reaching him—of holding converse with the King of all the Giants. This whole weary way have we toiled since then, and we know better now. Have we endured all these pains only to learn still deeper Life's saddest lesson—"Climb forever, and there is still an Inaccessible"?

Wetting our faces with the melted treasure of Nature's topmost treasure-house, Yo-wi-ye answers us ere we turn back from the Yosemite's last precipice towards the haunts of men: "Ye who cannot go to the Highest, lo, the Highest comes down to you!"

Origin of the Fenian Society.—A letter has appeared from the Hon. Thomas D'Arcy Gee, M. P. for Montreal, warning his constituency against the attempts being made to introduce this association amongst them, and giving his reasons why "the Fenian plant of disloyalty, the fungus of American growth, should never be transplanted to their soil." It will be in the recollection of every one that Mr. McGee was once an Irish rebel himself. He is now one of the most determined maintainers of British influence and connection in the provinces. In this character he pronounees against the Fenians, and cautions the people of Montreal not to entertain or tolerate their emissaries. In the course of his letter he observes:

"The Society of Fenians owes its origin to a certain titular Col. John O'Mahony of New York, its great 'Head Centre.' Mr. O'Mahony is, I understand, a gentleman of good family and excellent education—a graduate, if I am well informed, of Trinity College, Dublin. Soon after arriving in the United States, however, he became incurably insane on the subject of spiritualism, and while in that state took the life of his friend and entertainer, John Mitchel. Subsequently he passed several months in a madhouse, near Flatbush, Long Island, and while in the madhouse he laid the basis of 'the Feniau Brotherhood.' This bantling of a bedlamite has since run its insane career in the United States and Ireland, and is still, as it seems, seeking a foothold in the British provinces. Of course it would be for the conspirators a double triumph if they could entrap any of her Majesty's subjects in this country into their toils. They tried, at Hamilton, a point still nearer to the frontier than Montreal; but the vigilant and patriotic Bishop of Hamilton at once placed his heel on the serpent's head, and speedily it hissed its last. In our own good city, the solemn warning of Monsignor Baurget against such associations was read from the pulpit of St. Patrick's church, in September last, by the Very Rev. Mr. Dowd. But as those who set at defiance these spiritual authorities may not be wholly insensible to personal responsibility, I once more beg leave to quote the law of Lower Canada on this subject." * * *

The Fenian Brotherhood is a contemptible organization, so far as any danger of an attempt at revolution in this country may be involved. But still every possible effort ought to be used by our Government to counteract and suppress its operations.—Kilkenny Moderator.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

SIEGE AND CAPTURE OF DUPPEL.

"HOW long, Captain, think you, at this rate of artillery pelting, can Duppel hold out?"

This was the question put by a lieutenant to a captain of artillery, within the entrenchments of Duppel, on the morning of the 17th of April, during a temporary lull in the enemy's fire.

"It depends upon circumstances," was the reply. "Though the Prussians, within the last ten weeks, have rained enough of fire, shot and shell upon us to fill up our trenches with metal, Duppel can hold out for weeks against a mere bombardment such as that to which we have been so long exposed."

"In that case, Captain, I may assume it to be your opinion that Duppel cannot be taken for some weeks yet—so that if the London Confereuce should begin with establishing an armistice and end with restoring peace, it will not be taken at all."

"By no means," replied the captain. "Such an inference is not deducible from what I have said. I stated that against a mere bombardment such as we have hitherto experienced, Duppel could hold out for week, and I may add, for months, yet you know that a stronghold such as ours is not generally taken by bombardment."

Then you think the Prussians may deliver an assault?"

"Certainly."

"But in all previous attempts of the kind they have been worsted, so I should imagine they will not be in a hurry to repeat the experiment."

"Be not too sure of that. The Germans are a brave people—as brave as we are—and with all brave men, former defeats, so far from operating as impediments to future endeavors, have a precisely contrary effect. The remembrance of a failure creates a desire to attain success. The painful consciousness of defeat serves as a spur, which incites to further exertions, in order that the delicious sensation of victory may neutralize the pain of defeat."

"Well, suppose they should screw up their courage to repeat the assault, we are in as good condition as ever to repel them, so that their defeat is pretty certain to take place."

"I fervently hope so."

"Hope, Captain! why, it is almost a dead certainty. Man to man, a Dane is always a match for a German, on the open field; but a Dane behind a stone or earthen wall is enough to hold his position against half-a-dozen Germans."

"Unless he should chance to be shot down," observed the Captain.

"Such casualties," he continued, "are not uncommon in warfare. Besides, you know as well as I do, that this long confinement to barracks and entrenchments, together with the wretched accommodations, the extensive sickness which prevails among the troops, the constant suspense, and the extremely worrying character of the work in which they have been so long engaged—all these have told on the spirits of our army, and though the Danish soldier has a physical and moral stamina as tough as any soldier in the world, yet he is but human, after all. His powers of endurance are limited; and when he knows that his enemy is, or at any moment may be, twenty to one against him, even his valor is apt to become somewhat damped. You must also know that our reinforcements have not been at all equal to our losses, even from the enemy's fire. Our daily average in killed and wounded in these entrenchments, during the last two months, has been between forty and fifty men. Our loss by disease has been larger than this. But our reinforcements within the same period have not been more than two thousand. Thus, the defence of Duppel is some four thousand men weaker than it was nine weeks ago. Still our duty is clear. We must, if so ordered, resist to the last man. At the same time, I do think a little despatch might have been used in removing the dead bodies of the poor fellows who have fallen at their posts. This redoubt, I am aware, being the most advanced, is pre-emiuently exposed, and more difficult to clear of the killed and wounded; but, for the lifeless remains of half-a-dozen of one's fellow soldiers to be left lying before one's eyes for five or six hours, is a little too long."

"I agree with you, Captain; but I suppose there is no help for it. Our men are worked almost to death. But, talking about the dead bodies in the trench, I have a strange fancy that I saw one of them move his head a few minutes ago."

"Well, that is strange, for, do you know, I had the very same fancy."

"Odd, isn't it?"

"I say, Jansen," exclaimed the Captain, addressing a corporal stationed beside a gun, "just step down and turn round those poor fellows in the trench, for we have got an idea that some of them may have been merely wounded, and may have life in them yet!"

Jansen turned round to obey, but before he could advance a couple of steps the Captain and his friend were paralyzed with astonishment to see one of the supposed dead start to his feet, and with cat-like agility spring out of the trench, turn the angle of the redoubt, scamper over the ground with almost stag-like swiftness towards the first Prussian position, distant only about a hundred yards from the Danish redoubt.

All this took plaoe in less time than it takes to write it down.

The inaction resulting from extreme astonishment of the Danish defenders of the redoubt lasted no more than a second of time. The truth had flashed simultaneously across their minds. A German spy, dressed like a Danish soldier, had crawled up to the redoubt, crept into the trench, and lain among the dead and simulated death, that he might listen and learn something of the condition of the defenders of Duppel.

The conversation of the Captain and Lieutenant enabled him to ascertain more than he expected.

Great was the alarm and greater the indignation of the Danish officers. Yet in their hearts, and even with their tongues, they could not help rendering homage to the enemy whose rare intrepidity had prompted him to incur the risk of what would almost seem to be certain death, in order that he might glean information for his commander and country.

In a moment some half dozen rifles were levelled and discharged at the swift-footed spy. But none of them did him any harm. He escaped seathless, and in a minute or two more was closeted with the commander of the Prussian position, to whom he related all that he had heard of the state of the Danish army behind the fortifications of Duppel.

The Danes, through whose conversation he had gained his informatiou. were greatly chagrined.

"I have been much to blame," said the Captain.

"The blame is altogether mine," said the Lieutenant. "It was my confounded inquisitiveness that drew you out."

"Well," rejoined the Captain, "we have been both to blame, I in partieular; and now we must do all we can to prevent any mischief from resulting from our joint imprudence. Word must be sent at once to the General at headquarters that from observations we have made we are warranted in expecting a general and most determined assault on our positions from the enemy."

This was immediately done, and not a moment too soon.

The Danes were right in their anticipatiou as to the consequences of the German spy's report.

In less than an hour after his return, general commotion was observable all over the Prussian encampment.

Soon after, a fire, more terrible than any to which Duppel had, up to this day, been exposed, opened upon the Danish entrenchments.

Redoubts one, two, three, four, five and six were half destroyed by the continuous bombardment, and the defenders were in several places quite unprotected. The Prussians had approached their works on the left so very close to the redoubts as to be scarcely more than sixty metres distant. It was on this point that the storming columns made their first rush. In the centre the distance was somewhat greater, but on neither point were the Danes able to resist the vast numbers who poured in upon them. By 11 in the morning the first six redoubt were taken; and the besciegers, soon after seizing on the redoubt seven, hurried forward on the second line of entrenchments, raised during the few preceding nights. That line was composed, like the first, of a series of redoubts, united together by fosses and earthen ramparts. The Prussians having become masters of the centre and left, rushed on the right. There the redoubts eight, nine and ten of the first line fell, about 1 o'clock, into the possession of the Raven Brigade. The troops charged to defend those works, finding themselves separated from the rest army, and without any possibility of communication or succor, opposed, it would appear, a less energetic resistance, and it is probably there that the 2,000 prisoners were made, mentioned in the despatches. The Danes defended the tete-du-pont joining the Island of Alsen to the Sundewitt, just long enough to ensure their retreat. The Prussians would, beyond any doubt, have pursued their advantage if they could. The Danes succeeded in getting to the island, and then destroyed the bridge.

This assault cost the Prussians 1,000 men, and about 100 officers, in killed and wounded. The loss of the Danes was much heavier. Four entire regiments were almost completely annihilated. Se eral generals, and as many as 200 senior officers, were killed or disabled, and the loss in privates, in killed, captured and wounded, in this one final assault was immense. The remainder of the unfortunate Danish army made good its retreat across the narrow Alsen Sund into the Island of Alsen, while the greater part of the Prussians, flushed with success, moved northwards into Jutland, in order to lay siege to Fredericia—a small sea-port town in North Jutland, with about 5,000 inhabitants. It is a regular fortress, entered by four gates. It has nine bastions and three ravelins to defend it on the land side, and two more bastions towards the sea; but given the requisite time, and assuming that no foreign aid be received by Denmark, and it may be safely predicted that Fredericia is destined to share the fate of Duppel.

Marriage on the Coast of Africa.—Of the romance of love and courtship but little is known in Western Africa. On arriving at the age of puberty, if he be a free-born person, the young man finds a few wives, the number in proportion to the means of his father, awaiting the time of their espousals; and to this number he may add any that he may have fallen in love with in the foolishness of his boyhood; provided they are not betrothed to another, and provided further, that he is able to pay the required dower, which varies from $5 to $45. If he be a slave, he may find one or more appropriated to him, according to the taste of his master; and to these he may add according to his inclination and ability to purchase, and over those purchased he has perfect control; but at his death they become the slaves of his master. The wishes of the woman are seldom consulted. She is often purchased while still a child, and is told, when old enough to understand things, that she is to forego all thoughts of any other than the purchaser, and any disregard of this advice is punished as severely as though the marriage ceremony had already been performed.

African mothers are flattered to have suitors for their daughters while they are still young, and often dispose of them to the highest bidder, without the least respect to the appearance, age, or character of the buyer. The purchaser places a string of beads on the neck of the girl or child, and in case of the death of the mother before the child is of age, the husband expectant removes her to his home and places her under the guardianship of an old woman. Sometimes, however, a girl is lucky enough to find herself unsold when overtaken by the tender passion. She may then propose—for it is always leap-year in Africa—and if the man of her choice has still a vacant chamber in his heart (capacious hearts these fellows have) and the means of buying her from her parents, a union is formed on the basis of mutual attachment. Sometimes a betrothed girl falls in love, and if the object of her regard can arrange matters with the "husband by purchase," her marriage with him is allowed.

Love, like hunger, will break through a stone wall; and unlawful amours are constantly occurring, notwithstanding the severity with which adultery is punished. The punishment of a woman, if a husband desires it, is mutilation; the nose, an ear or a finger is taken off; the man generally is enslaved to the injured party. There is a difference in the domestic and social standing of the wives purchased as slaves and those received by dower and the consent of parents. The latter may leave their husbands at any time, by restoration of the dower. The former are slaves for life.

STRAY JOKES.

SALAD.

TO make this condiment your poet begs
The pounded yellow of two hard-boiled eggs;
Two boiled potatoes passed through kitchen sieve,
Smoothness and softness to the salad give.
Let onion atoms lurk within the bowl,
And, half-suspected, animate the whole.
Of mordant mustard add a single spoon,
Distrust the condiment that bites too soon;
But deem it not, thou man of herbs, a fault,
To add a double quantity of salt.
And, lastly, o'er the flavored compound toss
A magic soupcon of anchovy sauce.
Oh, green and glorious! oh, herbaceous treat!
'T would tempt the dying anchorite to eat;
Back to the world he'd turn his fleeting soul,
And plunge his fingers in the salad bowl!
"Serenely full," the epicure would say,
"Fate cannot harm me, I have dined to-day."

A cow was fatally injured in the town pound of Frogville, by running against a large iron spike, which projected from the fence. The owner sued the town for damages. His attorney made the following speech to the jury: "Gentlemen—The parish pound should be a safe asylum alike for the roaring bull and the gentle heifer. I appeal for no inflated damages. If I asked for them, or tried to hurry you beyond the evidence and the law, I should prove a traitor to my own home. I live in the town of Frogville, and it has my unqualified respect. So the love of country conspires with my love of justice, to demand that for this injury to this cow, whereby, to be sure, her tender bowels were let out, no vindictive damages should be assessed. But, gentlemen, let the majesty of the law be vindicated. Let Nemesis, who holds the scales on the top of this court house, alike through the long days of summer, and throughout the cold night-watches of mid-winter, smile with satisfaction on your verdict. Gentlemen, the blood of that cow cries out from that pound to be avenged."

LORD CHATHAM rebuked a dishonest Chancellor of the Exchequer by finishing a quotation the latter had commenced. The debate turned upon some grant of money for the encouragement of art, which was opposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who finished his speech against Lord Chatham's motion by saying: "Why was not this ointment sold, and the money given to the poor?" Chatham rose and said: "Why did not the noble Lord complete the quotation, the application being so striking? As he has shrunk from it, I will finish the verse for him: 'This Judas said—not that he cared for the poor—but because he was a thief, and carried the bag.'"

GEORGE III. of England was much vexed when allusion was made to his fatness. One day, while Prince Regent, he met Brummell, who was arm in arm with a friend, and cut the dandy—pretending not to know him and taking no notice of him—though he spoke to his companion. Brummell revenged himself by asking in a voice loud enough to be overheard: "I say, Jack, who is your fat friend?"

A CLASS in school was puzzled once in trying to spell the word "gallery." A girl, about 15, happened to overhear a little one spelling the word "Aaron," and immediately called out: "Master, master! I can spell it!"

Master.—"Well, try it again"

Girl.—"Big gal, little gal, e-ry."

AN Irishman, defendant in a Criminal Court, appearing to be very despondent, a friend tried to cheer him up by saying that the Judge would do justice to him. The Irishman replied, that was exactly what he was afraid of.

"What may her figure be?" I cried.
"One hundred thousand!" he replied.—O. W. Holmes.

SLIGHTLY PERSONAL.

THE pair of base hounds who run that infamous black-mail concern, The American Flag—D. O. McCarthy and C. B. McDonald—than whom two more utterly unscrupulous curs never escaped the gallows, or imposed themselves upon a decent community, have singled me out as an additional victim of their regular system of defamation and detraction, because, while in temporary charge of the editorial columns of the Gazette, I wrote and published an article or two, deprecating and rebuking that very system by means of which the retired horse-jockey and his low-priced pimp have bullied Union men into the support of their libellous sheet, and hope to make themselves the sovereign dictators of the Union party in this State. They first attacked me about ten days ago. (they had previously assailed the responsible editor of this paper in a manner which men of their peculiar relations should have had the discretion to refrain from,) and I replied in the only manner open to me. They kept up the discussion, and finding themselves getting the worst of it, they resorted to their usual method—a wholesale and infamous lie, relative to my connection with them and the Flag—a lie so palpable that it was pronounced such at first sight alike by parties acquainted with and totally ignorant of the persons concerned. The truth is here: When I arrived in Sonora I was eagerly intercepted by McDonald, who was entirely too much under the influence of a protracted debauch to attend to his editorial duties, and with just enough sense remaining to be aware of his condition, and who implored me to stop a few days and assist him. McCarthy was then absent. I remained until his return, and was then desired to stay longer. McDonald had an occasional lucid interval, but finally suffered a total relapse, and McCarthy requested me to assume the editorial duties of the Flag, and informed McDonald that he did not want him to come about until he got sober. Thereupon ensued a series of petty hostilities between McDonald and McCarthy, mostly confined to exchanges of insulting language and abusive epithets—no doubt well-merited on both sides—but which finally became a little more serious.

It was during the progress of this daily and hourly quarrel that I committed the only grievous error with which I have to reproach myself during my Sonora experience. One day the theatre of war was transferred to the editorial room where I sat writing. A large self-cocking revolver, of Whitney's patent, lay loaded and capped on a little shelf under the desk, ready for instant use in case any victim of the malevolence of this precious pair of bloodhounds should call for an explanation. As the quarrel grew warmer McDonald became frantic and making a sudden movement siezed the pistol. By a quick motion I seized his wrist and disarmed him. McCarthy then rushed out at the back door, and returned with a murderous weapon of iron in his hand. I again interfered and prevented him from striking McDonald with it; so the two baffled assassins stood glaring at each other in deadly hate, each thirsting for the other's blood, and neither daring to assault without the advantage of a weapon. The curses and obscenity of both at this juncture were horrible. The result is that McDonald was kicked out of doors by the common friends of the belligerents, and was carried, filthy and gory, from the gutter to his bed, where he lay till the whisky was soaked out of him, and he was fit for duty, when he returned to his place in the Flag office. The two villains could not afford to fall out. To borrow an illustration which a legal gentleman of this place once applied to a similar pair of rogues, though each alone might be fully able to paddle his own canoe, they knew that both together could paddle a steamboat.

McCarthy offered me a permanent place on the Flag, at the salary of $20 a week. I declined the generous proposition. He repeated it urgently, and said he would like to pay me more, but could not afford it; that he only paid McDonald $25, his foreman $20, a journeyman $12 (!) and a couple of boys their boarding—the first three paid their own boarding. I positively declined a place at any such salary, and that was all there was of that. I believe one of the hands in the office got angry at a remark I made about the wages, but he came just as near whipping me as McDonald did to whipping Gus. Preveau.

McCarthy acknowledges employing me, and states the compensation at $25 a week, besides boarding. He acknowledges that he employed me for several weeks. He paid me just $7 50, and when I asked him to settle he denied owing me anything. I then commenced suit against him, charging him $30 per week; but as I had no means of prosecuting it, I offered to withdraw it if he would pay my bill at the hotel. This, after much higgling, he agreed to do. McDonald was so ashamed of McCarthy's rascality in this affair, that he offered to pay me something—if he could get any money. I declined the offer. I went to Mariposa and made an engagement in the Gazette office for a stipulated period, which I fulfilled, and I believe I yet retain the friendship and respect of the big-hearted proprietor of that paper.

I have been thus minute in order to show what infernal liars, remorseless villains and blood thirsty cowards C. B. McDonald and D. O. McCarthy are. I fear neither the assassin's lead nor the libeller's pen. I have been barked at by as ferocious-looking dogs as they, before to-day.

It is true that I have had the misfortune at one time to be the victim of a baneful appetite, which sometimes led my reason prisoner, and caused me to commit errors for which I am both sorry and ashamed. But, thank God, I have not descended to the depth of baseness which that brace of unutterable scoundrels, McCarthy and McDonald, have attained by natural graviation.

IMPARTIALITY.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Herald tells the following good story: During General Birney's recent raid through Florida, a bright little girl was found alone at one house, her parents having skedaddled. She was rather non-committal, for she did not know whether the troops were Union or Rebel. Two fine dogs made their appearance while a conversation was being held with the child, and she informed one of her questioners that their names were "Gilmore" and "Beauregard." "Which is the best dog?" asked a bystander. "I don't know," said she; "they're both mighty smart dogs; but they'll either of 'em suck eggs, if you don't watch 'em."

THE AMOROUS AERONAUT—While Mons. Godard was filling an immense balloon in the Champ de Mars, he amused the spectators by sending up the small figure of a man, the perfect semblance of M. Thiers without spectacles. The little man being filled with gas, rose majestically into the air, and was soon lost to view among the clouds. His adventures, which became known the next day, were curious. Thanks to a strong and favorable gale, which impelled him on his course, the little balloon man arrived the same afternoon in sight of a fine country house in the neighborhood of Bievro. It was near the hour of dinner, and the lady of the mansion, who naturally thought herself perfectly safe, was occupied in the mysteries of her toilet.

It was a warm day, and she had opened one of the windows which looked out upon the park, and was safe from any prying eyes. While tranquilly engaged, by the assistance of corset lacing, in reducing her waist to a size and shape that would reflect credit on her husband's taste, she was suddenly startled by a blast of wind, followed by a strange noise; and immediately the casement was thrown open, and our little balloon man entered her chamber unannounced. The lady uttered a cry of terror, and threw a shawl over her shoulders. The little man, driven by the wind, throws himself upon the unhappy woman, who, screaming louder than ever, pushed him off, and he conceals himself under the bed.

Just as the wife, in a supplicating voice, says to this novel Don Juan, "Ah, Monsieur, go away, or you will ruin me!" the husband rushed furiously in, crying, "Ah, the wretch, I have him now!" and goes in search of his sword to run him through the body. The wife, more dead than alive, reiterates, in the midst of sobs, "Fly, fly, Monsieur! and save me the sight of a dreadful tragedy!"

The husband arrives, armed to the teeth, followed by the whole household, who seek to mollify his anger. While two of his friends hold the husband, a third, stooping down, perceives our little friend, who for good cause utters not a word, and catching him by the leg, draws him forth from his concealment, when, lo! Monsieur Balloon, no longer held down by the bedstead, raises himself erect, swells out and rises majestically to the ceiling, to the immense amusement of the spectators, while the poor jealous husband slinks away sword and all, heartily ashamed of his causeless wrath.—French Paper.

IDEAS ABOUT WOMEN.—A French book, recently published at Brussels, contains, among other interesting matters, a collection of aphorisms about women, taken from the writings of various authors. We copy a few of them:

In the choice of a lover, woman considers more how he appears in the eyes of other women than in her own. Love is more pleasing than matrimony, just as romance is more pleasing than history.—Chamfort.

If we speak ill of the sex generally, they will rise against us; if we do the same of any individual woman, they will agree with us.—Bonqueart.

Most of their faults women owe to us, whilst we are indebted to them for most of our better qualities.—Charles Lemsle.

Most women are endowed with such naturally endearing charms that even their very presence is generally beneficial.—Daniel Sterne.

Love in a woman's life is a history; in a man's an episode.—Madame de Stael.

Only he who has nothing to hold from a woman, is truly sincere in her praise.—Cutalina.

There exists among women a secret tie, like that among priests of the same faith. They hate each other, yet they protect each other's interest.—Diderot.

No woman, even the most intellectual, believes herself decidedly homely. The self-deception is natural, for there are some most charming women without a particle of beauty.—Stuhl.

Providence has so ordered it that only two women have a true interest in the happiness of a man—his own mother and the mother of his children. Besides these two legitimate kinds of love, there is nothing between the two creatures except painful and idle delusion.—Octave Feuillet.

Say of a woman that she is wicked, obstinate, frivolous, but add that she is beautiful, and be assured that she will ever think kindly of you. Say that she is good, kind, virtuous, sensible, but very homely, and she will never forgive you in her life.—Alphonse Carr.

In everything that women write there will be thousands of faults against grammar, but also to a certainty a charm never to be found in the letters of men.—Madame de Maintenon.

Great and rare heart-offerings are found almost exclusively among women; nearly almost all the happiness and most blessed moments in love are of their creation, and so also friendship, especially when it follows love.—Duclos.

Men can better philosophize on the human heart, but women read it better.—J. J. Rousseau.

THE DEAD ALIVE.—London, March 17, 1803.—We passed the evening with the Grimstones, talking about the Duke of Bridgewater, who, it was then thought, might very possibly be brought to life again, though he had been dead above a week. They told me the following extraordinary story:

Many years ago, a Mrs. Killigrew was supposed to have been dead above a week; when she was put into her coffin, her body was so swelled that it was found impossible to get her diamond hoop-ring off without cutting her finger; this her husband would not consent to; accordingly, she was buried with the ring. The sexton, who had observed this, determined to steal the ring that night. Having forced open the coffin, he proceeded to cut off the finger, but the first gash of the knife brought Mrs. Killigrew to life again. The sexton, frightened, ran away, leaving his lantern, which she immediately took, and walked to her own house. There her appearance, of course, created the greatest consternation among the servants—no one would venture to open the door; fortunately the rumor reached the ears of her disconsolate husband, who went directly to receive her. After this event she lived ten years, and in the course of that time had two children. A maid who belonged to Mrs. Killigrew, after her death lived with Mrs. Walters, grandmother to the Grimstones; from her they had this story.—Diaries of a Lady of Quality.

PRACTICAL DOMESTIC RECEIPTS.

The Complexion.—When freckles, sunburn, or black spots ("flesh-worms," as they are often called,) cannot be easily removed, it would be advisable to udopt the following remedy, which, thongh simple, is very efficacious: Mix some flower of sulphur in a little milk; let it stand a couple of hours; and then, without disturbing the sulphur, use the milk as a lotion, to be well rubbed into the skin with a towel. Almost immediately afterwards, the skin may be washed with soap and cold water. Another excellent preparation is the following: Take half a pound of soft wax; melt it over a slow fire with three ounces of sweet oil; add a small teacupful of fine sand; stir well together, and afterwards mould or press the mixture into cakes. It may be scented with a few drops of oil of bergamot or other perfume. It is to be rubbed on the skin at bedtime. Either of these preparations will be found most useful in beautifyiug the skin, if the bodily health be properly attended to at the same time by a medicine which may also act upon the skin.

Nervous Debility.—The sufferer should take as much exercise in the open air as he possibly can, and should be careful in his diet. Roast or boiled mutton, roast beef, chops and steaks, poultry and light puddings, should form his principal food. He should drink draught and bottled stout two or three times a day, and he need not be afraid of eating too much meat. Pastry, pickles, new bread, rich sauces, shell-fish, and other indigestible things, he should most carefully avoid. Of an evening he may take a little cold brandy and water. On no account must he use tobacco in any shape. The hip-bath, with a large sponge and cold water, will prove most serviceable. To assist the beneficial effects of all these rules, quinine must be administered, in connection with other invigorating substances.

THE FLORENCE.—This new and admirable Sewing Machine is meeting with the success which we predicted for it, when we first witnessed its operation. The verdict of the many who are congratulating themselves on their good fortune in having selected this machine when making their purchase is, "That no matter what kind of work they have to do, whether thick or thin, with silk or cotton thread, the Florence is always ready, and does not require any change to be made in the machine whatever, doing all in the same reliable and perfect manner."

MODERN IMPROVEMENTS.—If we purchase a house to live in, we are sure to want all the "modern improvements," and, in a descending scale, in all our purchases, we want the same. This fact applies with peculiar force to that important accessory to a household of the present day—a sewing-machine. When our fair readers purchase one of these, they want one, of course, with the "modern improvements"—they want to embroider as well as sew with the machine, for they never would be satisfied to make their dresses on the machine, and then slowly put on the embroidery by hand; nor need they, for with Grover & Baker's celebrated Machine they can do both, and with an ease and rapidity astounding to behold.

NEWLY-arrived persons should be informed that they can deposit small or large sums or coin in the California Building and Loan Society, at one per cent per month interest from the day of deposit and withdraw the same at pleasure. The Society is chartered for fifty years from May, 1861, as a joint stock company, having now two hundred and twenty-five partners, whose shares are fully paid in, and form a guaranty capital to all depositors. Loans are made on real estate only, and all transactions are in gold coin. Office, No. 406 Montgomery street, (opposite Wells, Fargo & Co.) Open daily from 10 A. M. to 3 P. M., and on Saturday evenings, from 7 1-2 to 9 o'clock.

THE EUREKA BILLIARD SALOON—over the Eureka Theatre, on Montgomery street, between California and Pine—is the most superbly fitted-up establishment on the Pacific Coast. It contains seven of Jacob Strahle's tables, unequalled by any other in elegance of style and finish. Messrs. Fitch & Wetherbee are the gentlemanly proprietors, and so conduct their establishment as to merit and maintain the leading patronage of gentlemanly knights of the cue, of the city and State. ju18

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following are the notices which appear in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the CALIFORNIAN is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest publication known to us. The CALIFORNIAN is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-bred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashious and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new candidate for public favor, in the shape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to conduct such a journal with credit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

CALIFORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the CALIFORNIAN, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper, owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

THE first number of the CALIFORNIAN, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The CALIFORNIAN contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

And the following we clip from the exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have received the second number of the new hebdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under the above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The high literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgment displayed in its selections, and its neat typographical execution, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a large and neatly printed weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" the first number from our table before we had examined it; the second number, however, is before us, and we find it filled with reading matter, original and selected, of the highest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured that they will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attainments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. The journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the CALIFORNIAN appears to be, and if the publisher will send us his journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best bow on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat and plain in typography, and gives evidence of the best of editorial talent.—Placerville Weekly News.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the name of a new weekly literary paper which is to make its début in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the business affairs of his journal properly, it is sure to succeed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

THE UNDERSIGNED GIVE NOTICE THAT THE above named corporation has been organized for the purpose of carrying on the Banking and Exchange business in all its branches, in this city and with the interior of this State, the neighboring State and Territories, and with Mexico; also with the Atlantic cities, Europe, China and the East Indies, for which they are provided with ample facilities, and in conformity with articles of association will commence operations on the 5th day of July next, at the Banking House now occupied by Donohoe, Ralston & Co., corner of Washington and Battery streets.

With the view of giving to the business of the corporation all the efficiency and promptitude of a private banking firm, together with that confidential seclusion of private business matters so generally desired, the immediate management of its affairs is committed exclusively to D. O. Mills and William C. Ralston, as President and Cashier, respectively, to whom, or either of them, the customers of the Bank will apply in all business matters. The regular meetings of the Board of Trustees will take place monthly.

The undersigned deem it advisable to call particular attention to the following peculiarities of their organization, which are positively binding on all its members:

First—Sales of its capital stock can be effected only after due appraisement by stockholders selected for that special purpose; and the Trustees of the corporation have, in all cases, the right to become purchasers of the stock appraised at the appraisement, for the benefit of the remaining stockholders. This restriction is printed upon each certificate of stock.

Second—Loans cannot be made to stockholders, except upon collaterals other than their shares in the capital stock of this bank.

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which by some injudicious prescription had been converted into an asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

For that is an article calculated to remove rather than to produce asthmatic affections. And as for COUGHS AND COLDS, the world never saw a better remedy, and never will, until nature produces some new ingredient out of which to prepare it. Don't be afraid to use it freely. Every article in it is from nature's own laboratory—the same today as they were a thousand years ago—all calculated to soothe, heal and strengthen. There is no

BETTER FAMILY MEDICINE!

Keep it in the house, use it freely yourself, and give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold. By so doing you may save yourself many days and nights of care, anxiety and watchfulness so inseparably connected with the chamber of the sick. jy2

THE CALIFORNIA COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE,

FOR GIRLS,

Nos. 64, 66, 68 and 70 Silver street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

MRS. M. B. SWEDENSTIERNA, Principal.

TWELFTH SESSION,

Commencing August 8th, 1864.

THIS INSTITUTION IS DESIGNED TO AFFORD FACILities for the education of girls, fully equal to those furuished nt the best Seminaries of the Atlantic States. The course of study is unusually comprehensive, embracing all the branches that the best modern authorities have thought could he advantageously incorporated in the most enlarged scheme of Female Education. In the Collegiate Department it includes the higher mathematics; a course of English Literatnre and Criticism, taught by a method not elsewhere pursued; Natural History; the Physical Geography of the Pacific Coast; Critical and Universal Grammar; Ecclesiastical History; and the modern applications of Physical Science.

The organization of the School into departments and graded classes, facilitates the pursuit of a regular and systematic course of study. No pupil is permitted to take up the higher branches until thoroughly grounded in the preparatory ones. In the advanced classes, the instruction is to a great exteut independent of text-hooks; and in no case is "going through the book," considered equivnlent to "fiuishing a study."

Calisthenics, consisting of the wand-exercise, etc., take place in the gymnasium daily, from 12 to 12 1-2 o'clock.

Parents, guardians, and others interested in the thorough education of girls, are invited to call and witness for themselves the methods of instruction pursued, the general organization of the school, and its daily workings, which furnish a more reliable test of the excellence of such institutions, than any public examination. No particular "visiting days" have heen appointed, the Principal and teachers heing gratified by the attendance of visitors, at their daily recitations, at any time and without unusual preparation. Such visits do not in any way interrupt nr interfere witb the regular routine.

Registers containing full particulars as to the course of study, terms, regulations, etc., can be obtained upon application by mail, or to the Principal personally, at the Seminary. jy16-tf

PART THREE—PIGEON WING DISCOURSES ON "VIRGINIA."

VIRGINIA CITY is one of those places which can neither be imagined nor described. It must be seen, to be understood and appreciated. When immediately on my arrival I rushed out on the balcony of the International, impatient to see it, my eye wandered over a confused mass of people and horses, and huge wagons, and omnibuses and stage coaches, and private carriages, and great muddy pools in the village like streets, with here and there a richly-dressed woman trailing her skirts over them, and crowds of men with their hands in their pockets, and shocking bad hats on their heads, leaning against the lamp-posts, propping up the houses and cumbering the sidewalks generally. Indian women with pappooses on their backs wandered listlessly by, holding bouquets of wild flowers curiously arranged, which they offered silently to the passers by; intelligent contrabands sat at street corners, polishing boots and reading the San Francisco papers; Chinamen laden with baskets of wood trotted along as solemnly and earnestly as if the fuel they carried was to set the world on fire; and, over all, vibrated the busy hum of life. The oaths of the teamsters and the sharp crack of their whips as they urged their patient mules up the steep hills, and the merry tinkling of a hundred bells, each answering with a different tone the imperative "g'lang!" of the wild, unshorn, sunburnt and dusty driver—ragged and dirty, perhaps, but with a certain manliness which the habit of command always imparts, and which the mere trader and dealer never acquire. Mingled with those discordant sounds came the faint echo of music from the open door of some gambling-house far down the street, and the abrupt cries of omnibus conductors, announcing "Gold Hill," "Silver City," and other metallic villages. Large houses and small cottages stood in democratic juxtaposition, in all the freedom and equality of a new settlement. Comfortable, well-to-do brick houses of three and four stories, with verandahs and French windows, looked complacently upon wooden tenements scarce a story high. As I looked up and down the long, narrow streets, the scene that met my eye was a curious one. It was such a mingling of incongruous things! Opposite was a very small house with a very large sign of some family sewing-machine. Near by was an apothecary's shop with advertisements of patent medicines warranted to cure everything but the hard times; then a milliner's shop with bridal wreaths and veils, and head-dresses and children's caps, and the delicate garments of an infant's wardrobe; and all along the sidewalks clusters of hoop-skirts mixed up strongly with rough boots for miners, were hanging over the doors or filling the show windows like some new invention for catching flies. Ready-made coats and pants like the limp wings of boneless birds, flapped against the windows of a restaurant or fruit-stand. Brooms and wagon whips and pack-saddles for mules, and miner's tools and garden-seeds blended grotesquely with bandana handkerchiefs and woolhats, and calicoes and ribbons and gay-looking fabrics fluttering like pennants, and artificial flowers, showing how numerous was the female population, although there were few representatives of the sex in the streets. We saw one occasionally at an open window or leaning over a balcony, but the wind and dust probably kept them at home.

The whole scene reminded us so strongly of San Francisco in the early days that we could almost fancy ourselves in Dupont or Kearny streets, twelve winters ago, before the advent of the rag-pickers, when loose bits of straw drifted about on every passing wind, and scraps of paper, and empty tin cans crushed out of shape, and broken bottles and old hats, and odd boots and shoes, and worn-out flannel shirts, and ominous mud-holes with finger-boards warning travellers from their miry depths, obstructed the way. I recognized many of the old names over the new doors in Virginia City, and some of the very same faces, only older and harder, in the streets. There were the same Spanish women, in slippered feet and flounced muslin skirts and dirty rebosas, smoking cigaritos lazily in the doorways. There were the same unmistakable Israelitish physiognomies looking at us over the counters. The same broad-faced, well-to-do Dutchman drinking lager in the corner grocery, and the same jolly Irishman standing behind a chair, or fanning himself with a napkin at the door of the wide-open restaurant. The same melancholy Chinaman stood at the door of his little hovel blowing the ashes off the saucepan with which he had ironed shirt-bosoms twelve years ago in San Francisco. He clattered about in the same wooden shoes, and wore the same blue garments cut in the same fashion worn centuries ago by his countrymen—the only unchanging element in a land of change. From subterranean saloons came the same smothered sound of music and sudden bursts of laughter and loud voices in dispute. It was San Francisco over again—but better and more advanced in five years than San Francisco was at the same age. The streets were better, the brick buildings more numerous, the population more peaceable; there are fewer murders and fires, and all the means and appliances of comfort more abundant and infinitely cheaper. But it must not be forgotten that Virginia has California for its base of supplies, whereas San Francisco had no nearer market than the Sandwich Islands. When San Francisco was five years old, eggs were considered such a luxury that guests at the hotels ordered them by sending their cards, as they order wine, and paid for them as extras at the rate of three dollars a dozen. Then all our cakes and custards were made of Farallon eggs. They stood in barrels and boxes outside the grocer's shops, and we bought them by the pound, red and green, blue and brown, and speckled. Turkeys were fifty dollars a pair, and poor at that, as may be readily imagined after a voyage from the Sandwich Islands. We remember a Thanksgiving dinner at the Oriental Hotel made famous by the first appearance of turkeys on that board. Our liberal host paid two hundred dollars for eight, and we ate them. It was such a great occasion that we invited John Phœnix to dine with us, and we remember that he defined the Pope's nose to the wondering inquiry of a little child who sat beside him at table as "that part of the turkey which gets over the fence last." We remember how afraid we were that the eight turkeys would not "go around" among seventy guests, and how we were relieved when John Murphy—prince of waiters (long may he wave!)—brought us our full share, with the first cranberries from Oregon. Turkeys are no longer rarities in Virginia City, and we saw there all the varieties of fruits and delicacies to be found in the markets of San Francisco. We had a handsome room at the International Hotel, and our accommodations were in every respect unexceptionable.

The climate we found abominable; although in the middle of June, the weather was very cold. We had frost and snow, and the mountains were white during the whole of our visit. The prospect around the city is sterile and harsh; not a tree, not a green spot; mountains and huge hills lift their desolate peaks all around it. They look as if some mighty conflagration had swept over them, scorching and destroying every living thing upon them, save the dry and dusty sage brush—even the vitality of the soil. Yet they grew upon us, these desolate peaks defining themselves against the sky, and lifting up their stricken heads to heaven as if calling upon the clouds to cover them. We found our eyes wandering back to them again and again, by that strange sort of fascination which impels people to visit mad-houses and asylums for the maimed and blind and dumb. After sunset, when the purple haze of twilight settles upon them, they are positively beautiful. We were never weary of looking at them; they had a weird charm for us that drew us irresistibly to them. In their roughest aspect they silenced and subdued us. They seemed to say: "Look upon us! we defy alike your pity and your scorn. Nature cursed us at our birth, and we stand here naked and deformed—the monuments of her wrath. The storms and snows of winter sweep over us unpityingly; the summer winds heap ashes upon our heads; no life-giving principle abides within our sterile bosoms; the very elements abhor us. In us behold the embodied curse of an angry mother!" Mount Davidson, which is the highest of these peaks, rises abruptly to the height of perhaps a thousand feet directly behind Virginia, which seems to nestle against it for shelter and protection. Between them lies the great Comstock ledge, which has made the fortune and the ruin of so many people. It is divided into numerous claims; but is best known to the world through the Ophir, the Mexican, and Gould and Curry. All these valuable mines lie close together, as if Nature had gathered her lap-full of treasures and poured them out in a heap.

I felt very sad and full of thought as I stood upon the threshold of these great vaults in which Nature had shut up so securely for centuries her choicest treasures, without the aid of patent locks and keys. Mount Davidson seemed like a great giant set there to watch over them, frightening away the boldest adventurer with his repulsive aspect, his Medusa-like head and his withering breath. I thought how often in this world one man sows that another may reap. I thought how often Providence chooses the humblest instruments to work out the greatest ends, and to accomplish the most wonderful results. I thought how the savage for centuries had wandered over these bleak hills in search of game—had stood, naked and hungry perhaps, over a treasure which had enriched the world, and knew it not. How Fortune lay here silent and motionless, like the Sleeping Beauty of the fairy tale, until the rightful Prince should come along, and by some wonderful talisman should awaken her. I thought of the two poor, unlettered youths who had been guided hither by some mysterious Power to break the spell. I imagined the dreariness and desolation of the scene as they first looked down upon it from some neighboring summit. If they had not been divinely guided, they would have turned back in despair. I imagined their many disappointments, and at last their wonderful discovery—small, perhaps, at first, but gradually dawning upon them, that they might not be overwhelmed by its magnitude. And then I thought of their lonely, cheerless winter, shut in by snows from all communication with the world, all companionship with mankind, and as if that were not enough of suffering, I thought of the terrible accident that disabled one of them—of his mortal illness in that desolate solitude—of his vain longing for human help and sympathy—of his painful death—of his solitary grave. I thought of the loneliness of the survivor: how the sight of his heaps of treasure must have mocked him—they would not purchase for him one loving smile, or the sound of a human voice. Perhaps it never occurred to him, that it was not for himself he had been chosen to become the greatest discoverer of his age—that it was not simply to become the possessor of countless wealth that he was here, but to work out a miracle at which the world should wonder. He little thought, perhaps, that with every stroke of his pick he was planting deeper and deeper the seed of a civilization which should grow and spread, until whole nations might shelter themselves under its branches—that through his work the wilderness should blossom like a garden—that when he looked upon the first piece of glittering ore which he dug from the earth, he looked upon the foundation-stone of a new Country, which, resting upon the Sierras, should spread its wings from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean. I wondered if in the long dark nights of that dismal winter he ever saw such visions in his dreams. I wondered if a man could play so great a part, and yet not know it. I thought of Columbus and his great discovery, and the chains and dungeon that awaited his return to the country which should have honored him; and I thought of the poor young Grosch brothers, and their unknown graves, and their unrewarded labors; and I thought again how often in this world one man sows that another may reap.

PIGEON WING.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XV.

AFTER a long fight, love triumphed over my terrors. I returned to the chateau firmly resolved on an explanation with my guardian. I found M. de Maufert in his study. I begged him to grant me an interview.

"I am at your service, mon cher," said he, with that feigned pleasantness which he lately used towards me. "Without reproaching you, your visits here are rare enough for me to consider them as good fortune, although it is almost always a sign that you lack money."

"It is not that which brings me here," replied I.

"Ma foi, so much the worse, for I am in funds. Sit down, and let us see what it is all about. If it is feasible it shall be done."

"It is about something very simple, sir," replied I, in a calm tone. "I come to ask you to send away one of your servants."

"Bah! which one?"

"Monsieur Placide, your steward."

The Count shrugged his shoulders. "Oh, ho!" said he, "it is a very grave business that you broach. And why, if you please?"

"Because he has offended me," replied I, coldly.

"Pshaw! you do not forget your ill will. You still remember that foolishness? It seems to me, however, that you have surely taken your revenge in beating him so severely. No one is offended by Placide, mon cher, and your susceptibility is only childishness."

"Would you, sir, also call childishness a judiciary action which would tend to morally assassinate me by declaring before a tribunal that I am notoriously known to be crazy?"

"Bah! what provincial gossip," said he with an air of indifference.

"Here is the proof, sir," said I, "drawing from my pocket the summons which the farmer gave me."

"But this is addressed to Guillot," interrupted the Count, glancing over the paper.

"Oh, I allow that M. Placide has not gone so far as to accuse me before the Correctional Police," replied I bitterly.

"Parbleu! after having been hauled about by you in such a way, the fool wished to revenge himself, and wound you to the quick, at the same time leaving you out from the action."

"Are you sure, sir, that would leave me out of the action?" replied I, looking him straight in the eye.

"And what diabolical intention do you wish me to attribute to him? He has done wrong in going so far, I confess; but at the same time, my friend, why are you so ready with your fists. I will arrange all that by reprimanding him, and he will make humble apologies to you."

"Apologies, sir! they will not answer."

"Then it is a veritable vendetta, from what I see," said my guardian, irritated by my coolness.

"Believe me, mon cher, you must know how to limit your wishes in this world. Placide is useful to me, and I cannot hang him solely to please you. Your request is a crazy one—excuse the word."

"Oh, you can say it, sir; I am prepared for it."

"So much the better; do not attach so much importance to this ridiculous attack and prove your good sense, by contenting yourself with the satisfaction which I am ready to exact, in order to save your amour propre."

"My amour propre," returned I, "when a gross insult is in question. It is necessary that we explain ourselves clearly, sir, for it seems to me that the consequences which will result from what you call a ridiculous attack escape you. I am not like other people, sir; you told me so yourself, one day—my grandfather was crazy and my mother mad."

M. de Maufert could not repress a gesture of astonishment at hearing me bring up these terrible recollections.

"Oh, do not be frightened. You see that I am calm," continued I, in a tone which involuntarily partook of irony.

In his turn he looked me straight in the face, and I thought I detected an ominous smile.

"Go on."

"I have still sufficient sense left me, sir, to understand the deplorable situation in life to which this double misfortune has reduced me. If one accused you of madness, sir, no one would believe such a wicked invention; but against me, sir, such an accusation becomes extremely serious."

"Pooh! mon cher," said my guardian, shrugging his shoulders, "what are you driving at? You have a very bad imagination."

"What am I driving at! This, sir: When I shall be no longer protected by your guardianship, there will perhaps come a time when some grasping relative will conceive the idea, (darker than mine, you perceive) of having me interdicted. My 500,000 francs income will be a fine allurement. In this case you have too much sense not to understand that a judiciary document attesting my well-known madness would become a terrible weapon against me if I neglected to defend myself from this first accusation. This is why I demand of you, first, as a protestation on your part against such action that you send away your steward, and afterwards that you ascertain if there is any legal reparation to assume my place in the world and to protect my future."

My guardian opened his eyes as though I were speaking Hottentot.

"What the plague does the imbroglio signify? Voyons! I cannot admit that this foolish Guillot is so near your heart, and that these extravagant fears have suddenly driven you into this suspicious condition. Some one has put you up to it, surely."

"I beg you to believe, sir, that I have reason enough left to comprehend fully the injury contained in this libel, and I am astonished to find you so indifferent to it."

"It is because I see nothing serious in it; the best response to such idle trash is contempt. I cannot, to gratify your childish susceptibilities, deprive myself of the services of a steward who is indispensable to me. And still less can I lend myself to these foolish quarrels, which can only result for the amusement of fools."

"Have you nothing more to say, sir?" said I, in a tone of derision.

"Placide will ask your pardon. I promise you this, and it is all I can do for you.'

"In this case if I defend myself!"

"What do you mean to do?"

"I do not know. but I believe myself sufficiently injured to enter in my turn a complaint for defamation."

"Oh, no, you will not do that!"

"And why, if you please?"

"Because I will not permit it," replied he shortly.

"Then I shall have the pain of acting without your permission."

"There is only one little difficulty in this little plan," said he, hauteringly; "people will laugh at you—for you cannot bring an action or reclaim anything without the consent of your guardian."

"Even if my guardian shows himself not as careful to protect me?" said I with a bitterness I could not repress.

"You go too far," exclaimed he; "you forget, it seems, to whom you speak!"

"I do not forget it, sir, since I came to place myself under your protection."

"But you are also under my authority—know that! And I will not permit you to engage in a dispute which will couple my name with yours in a ridiculous business."

Such disdain exasperated me:

"Ridiculous!" exclaimed I; "Ridiculous! when it concerns my dignity, my life. But, sir, what interest have you that it should remain an established fact that I do not possess my reason."

M. de Maufert made a terrible gesture. He walked up and down the room in violent anger. Then he approached me—the mask had fallen:

"Believe me," said he with closed teeth, "do not attempt to revolt. You know that I am not very patient. Do not try to provoke scandal, for it is a direct attack upon me."

"I do not know that it is necessary to provoke a scandal in order to have you protect me from insult," replied I, proudly; "but I declare that I will revolt against you if it be necessary."

"Hold! you make me pity you," replied he; "do not oblige me also to say that you are crazy."

This word went through my brain like a red hot iron.

"You lie!" exclaimed I.

My guardian replied with a sneer. I felt my mind tremble. A cloud of blood blinded me. I feared to commit a crime, and fled.

Beside myself, with indignation I crossed the park searching for Placide—and I would have killed him, I believe—when by good luck, at the turn of an alley, I found myself face to face with Diana.

"André," said she, much moved, "where are you running to?"

"Leave me," replied I, "I go to revenge myself."

She wished to detain me. I struggled to free myself from her grasp.

"André! André!" said she imploringly.

"Tell me they have lied!" cried I, "tell me I am not mad!"

"What has happened?" said she. "You must have had an altercation with the Count; I am sure of it."

By her emotion I understood that it would throw her into deep grief if I unveiled the perfidy of which I was the victim. I confessed I had had a discussion with M. de Maufert, but I hid the cause from her. It would have been painful for me to reveal to Diana the contemptible conduct of the man whose name she bore, and the usual rudeness of my guardian was sufficient to explain my trouble; and besides I could not resist the empire which Diana had over me, and under this influence my anger rapidly vanished. It was decided that I should avoid my guardian that day, for fear that an imprudent word would waken a feeling between us that was now hardly appeased.

Left to my reflections, I commenced coolly to think over the inexplicable conduct of the Count. I must own that, in spite of the invincible dislike I felt towards this singular protector, I had despised the singular accusations that the Jew Abraham one day brought against him before me. M. de Maufert was rich, and his sordid avarice exalted into a princely fortune the 100,000 francs income he possessed, of which he did not spend more than a quarter a year. I could not believe that the love of gold in his heart was powerful enough to stifle his pride of name, and drive him to such an infamous crime of lese humanité. My pride of race revolted that one of my relatives, even one so distant, could become a robber and a thief. But at this decisive hour, when I was myself cowardly abandoned by him, it was impossible not to become suspicious. Guillot's reports proved to me too well that public rumor already attributed to my guardian's guilty motives. The next day I sent for Bastien:

"Bastien," I said to him, "I have need of a sincere friend, who will not hesitate before the fear of making an enemy of M. de Maufert, and who loves me enough to tell me the truth, however terrible it may be. I thought of you."

"Ma foi, M. André!" replied Bastien; "perhaps it is bold for me to call myself your friend; but if it is only necessary for me to risk my life in your service, you know I am not easily frightened. I have a hand as firm as my heart; use them both as you will."

"Thank you, I counted on this; but at this moment I have need of your frankness. Will you swear to answer me truly, without dissembling through fear of afflicting me?"

"Indeed, M. André," said Bastien, much embarrassed, "that depends—"

"It concerns my future, my fortune, and my life!"

"Oh, then, question me; I am ready."

At the moment of raising the veil I hesitated, I acknowledge; but I soon rallied.

"What do they say in the country about my relations with my guardian?"

"Pooh! every one knows that he is proud, brutal, and, above all, an avaricious man, with whom it is hard to live, and no one ignores that he is not very tender towards you."

"And what do they say of me?"

"Every one loves you; you are as generous to all as he is stingy."

"That is not what I ask you. Don't they talk of some affliction—some misfortune—frequent in my family?"

Bastien was troubled; he would not understand me.

"M. André, everybody has his enemies; but you ought soon to be master of your estates. You are so rich!"

"It does not concern my estates. You understand me. You see that I am calm. Treat me like a man. I ask you whether they say that I am threatened with madness, like my mother?"

"Well—if you wish to hear the truth—it is on account of your family—there are some people who do not reason—rumors which are spread abroad—"

"Ah! there are rumors circulated about me?"

"Pardieu! I had a quarrel the other Sunday with that rascal Placide, who was repeating to two or three fools that you have fits, during which you are completely unconscious."

"So, then, it is from him that these calumnies come?"

"Pardieu! No one would ever have thought of it—seeing you so gay, so kind-hearted, and so well. It needed the wickedness of this Norman to invent it. Every one who knows you well, like I do, knows that it is not so, and defends you; so do not let that disquiet you."

"Thanks, my good Bastien; that is all I wish to know."

XVI.

I WRITE you these few lines hastily, my good William, for fear that you are alarmed at not hearing from me since last week. The condition of my dear Schultz is alone the cause of the interruption of my "romance," since you thus call the sweet and cruel recital which you exact of me. For two days I was obliged to leave my writing to go to the assistance of my poor doctor. I have, as usual, contended with his two attacks by appealing to his will, and, above all, to his logic which really, with my aid, is wonderful. I will save him; I feel it, for the empire I hold on his mind grows stronger day by day, and he has such an amount of sensibility that I am certain of healing the brain by the heart. One example will show you: The other morning, as I saw that he was less docile than usual, I dared to bring him one of his sons, who was in the adjoining room. As soon as he saw himself in the presence of one of his children he became troubled and was much moved.

"Schultz," said I to him, "is not God in the look of this tender being?"

The poor lunatic took his child in his arms and gave me his hand smiling; paternal love had triumphed. One thing astonished me, and that was not to find tears in his eyes. I wept; but the child gone, there was no more said about monomania

You will allow that mine is a strange situation, William: lately condemned for madness, I nurse my doctor, I become the liberator of my jailor. I would laugh, were it not so sad. As it is, I am constrained to leave my pen idle on the white paper, for Schultz occupies me all the day long. Judging that it would be salutary to break up by excessive fatigue the current of thoughts which have for some time oppressed him, I pretended great desire for exercise; and I thus obliged him to accompany me in forced walks across the country in all kinds of weather. We returned home in the evening, and, the Lord pardon me! the walks did me as much good as they did him. Fritz has remarked that my sleep, generally very much disturbed, after one of these walks is as sound as that of a mole. But I must leave you. My tyrant reclaims me. I am preparing for a walk of five or six leagues.

P. S. My tyrant has just come in. Finding me at my desk he appeared disturbed, and doubtlessly believed himself abandoned for the day.

"You are busy," said he to me, in a timid tone of voice.

"No," replied I, "only a word to my friend William."

"Do you tell him you will soon go to see him?"

"Not at all."

"Is that true?" replied he, regarding me anxiously.

I saw that his mind was already wandering. It suddenly occurred to me to try him by communicating my letter to him.

"William is a sympathetic man, to whom I confide my greatest secrets," said I to him. "Read what I have written him."

He unfolded the paper. At first he could not suppress a gesture of surprise. The first shock overcome, he calmly continued, approving each phrase with a nod of the head as though he were consulting a brother physician—not the slightest sign of disquietude at the recollection of this terrible trouble suspended over his head. He dared to look the enemy in the face. He is on the road to recovery. In discovering the subterfuge to which I had recourse, "Allons," said he with a mischievous look, "let me go for your hygienic walk," and he began to laugh.

He laughed, William. I only tell you that. He laughed a good hearty laugh, and his face did not display the slightest disquietude. What do you think of the talents of your friend, Dr. André? You have no need to stop half way on the road to extravagance. I am ready to cure you.

THE DRESS OF A GENTLEMAN.

MR. CARLYLE, in his Sartor Resartus, observes that whoso has sixpence is master of the world. He can command tailors to clothe him, cooks to feed him, servants to wait on him—to the extent of sixpence. The limitation as to the extent of the field of operations of this paltry sum is perhaps better understood in this country at this time than it might have been a few years since. Money will buy clothes, and, as the Jews will tell you, clothes will buy money. Logically speaking, money and clothes are convertible terms, though clothes are somewhat more of a necessity than money. Habiliments are indsapensible in civilized countries, whereas money may not be. One may take his choice of the two, if he is unable to have but one. There are persons not a few who array themselves in gorgeous attire, and yet cannot produce a cent from their pockets; such generally prefer clothes to money.

The writer has in his possession a valued heir-loom, which is a wooden lay-figure of the average size of a man. Time has nearly effaced the inscription which it bears, but it can be read by the aid of a glass. It runs thus:

Johannes Bourne,
Hoc Fecit.
London, 1630, Anno Domini,
Laus Deo: Amen.

From all that can be ascertained, some ancient member of the family had a passion for preserving samples of clothing for accompanying it were whole suits of clothiug of the styles that prevailed in his day; and in his will he wrote the following: "To my elder sonne and heir by righte and lawe, William, I do give & bequeathe the statue whiche Mr. Johne Bourne did maken. I do enjoin uponne him to give it at least one newe suite of gentleman's clothes dureing his lifetime & preserve it. When William shall die he shall bequeathe this to his heir on the like conditions. It must never be lette go out of the familie." Some time we may jot down a description of the various suits that have come down with this old figure, but at present we shall limit ourselves to the cost of dressing it in the present style. This duty devolved upon the writer to whom the figure now belongs, and the account, after all the purchases had been made, stood thus:

1 Black dress coat	$60
1 Pair black pants	16
1 White silk vest	15
1 Pair patent leather boots	20
1 Pair kid gloves	2 75
1 Silk hat	6
1 Plain cravat	2 25
Underclothing	12
Total	$134 00

So much for this old relic, which is simply lignum et prætera nihil.

Taking the above figures for a beginning, we are able to tell almost to a cent how much money it costs a gentleman to appear in company, dressed as becomes his station. Of course there is no limit to the amount of money that may be expeuded for jewelry; but we prefer to make a fair estimate—neither the highest nor the lowest that might be made. The list of such articles naturally includes a gold watch and chain, seal-ring, studs and sleeve-buttons, and glove-links. The cost of these may be set down thus:

Gold-hunting watch	250
Gold chain	75
Sleeve-buttons	30
Studs	30
Seal-ring	50
Glove-links	25
	$460
Clothing as above	134
Total	$594

In other words, a gentleman who wishes to get himself up in proper style in New York society can do it for about $600. This amount of money will put him in very presentable shape, with an opportunity to spend as much more as he may choose.

But there are other matters connected with the subject which ought not to be overlooked. A lady arrays herself and there is the end of expense. Her object is to make a pleasing appearance, by means of which others will be attracted to her and extend to her those attentions which her sex so highly value. With a gentleman, however, the case is entirely different. His expense only begins when he is in full dress; so that, in fairness, there are many other items which, if not a part of his clothing, are inseparable from it. To attempt to enumerate these items and their cost would be a thankless task, to say nothing of the difficulty of rating them with any accuracy. There is no limit to the amount of money a gentleman may expend in escorting ladies to places of amusement, in carriage hire, kid gloves, bouquets, perfumery, quiet suppers at Delmonico's, and waiters' fees, to say nothing of presents of every sort, from jewelry to sheet music, all of which are eminently calculated to win for one the doubtful epithet of "ladies' man."

We trust no one will infer from this article that we mean to say that no gentleman can appear in respectable society without spending five or six hundred dollars on his apparel:

> "You may daub and bedizen the man as you will,
> But the stamp of the vulgar remains on him still."

Yet "the apparel oft best proclaims the man." Extravagance is the curse of the times, and it will be a good day for the country when simplicity and neatness are more universally regarded as the mark of a true gentleman. The few who affect negligence in dress would do well to ponder on the remark of a noted clergyman of Brooklyn, that "dress does not make the man, but a man looks better dressed up." Those who are extravagant in the matter will probably receive advice enough without any aid of ours.—Round Table.

THE GRIZZLY BEAR.

THE Grizzly Bear has been seen as far north as 61 deg. of latitude, and as far south as Mexico; its range is confined, on the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains, to their spurs and slopes, and the plains that skirt their bases. On the western side their range extends, wherever the ground is rocky and mountainous, to the Pacific.

To the northward and eastward of the Great Salt Lake there is a region called the Barren Lands or Grounds, and here a large bear has been found, which was for a long time supposed to be a distinct species, called the Barren-ground Bear; but this is now almost proved to be the grizzly bear.

The grizzly bear is twice as large and strong as the black bear, and as tenacious of life as an eel. There is no account, in the hundreds of "bear stories" told, of one ever having been killed outright by a single shot. The travellers Lewis and Clark record that one, after receiving five bullets through the lungs, and five other severe body wounds besides, swam a considerable distance to a sand-bar in the river and lived for twenty minutes after its arrival there; another, which was shot through the heart, ran a couple of hundred yards; whilst a third, shot through the lungs, pursued a hunter more than half a mile.

The grizzly bear measures often nearly ten feet from the tip of its nose to the tip of its very short tail, and weighs from a thousand to twelve hundred pounds. The hair is abundant, long, and varying between gray and blackish brown. On the muzzle it is short and pale; the nose is long, narrow, and rather flat, and the canine teeth very large and strong. Its strength is so great that it overpowers and kills the largest bison bull, and then can convey the carcase to its place of concealment. Here, like many other animals, it digs a hole for the reception of its prey, until that is exhausted, when necessity compels it to renew the chase.

It is stated by close observers that the bears differ in ferocity, those on the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains being more fierce, pugnacious, and more fond of animal food than those on the western slopes, where the climate is milder and vegetable food in greater abundance. The females and cubs are said to hibernate, though the males are found abroad at all seasons.

In San Francisco, Sacramento, Benicia and some other towns, cruel fights between grizzly bears and wild bulls were of frequent occurrence, ending usually in the discomfiture of the bull.

A hunter attached to an overland train from St. Louis to El Paso left his horse to try and stalk an antelope. When nearing his game he was surprised to see it spring away, although he felt convinced it had neither heard, seen, nor smelt him. A few minutes served to show him that a grizzly, or "Old Ephraim," as he is called on the plains, had been trying to creep upon the antelope. They both caught a view of each other at the same moment; and the bear, feeling "done" out of his supper, advanced upon the hunter. It was no use running—his horse was half a mile off; so the hunter awaited the attack, though he knew that it was almost useless to expect his rifle to kill or disable the bear; he felt, as he expressed it, that his "chance was a slim one." A bright thought all at once occurred to him. He had on his shoulders a stout Mexican blanket with a slit in the middle of it, to be worn as a poncho; he waited till the bear rose on his feet for his spring, and threw his blanket over the bear. The head of the grizzly came through the slit, and the long ends encumbered his feet, whilst the blanket, woven closely to resist rain, proved too tough for even his powerful claws to tear easily; and, whilst "Old Eph" was working "tooth and toe nails," the hunter was "making tracks" to reach his horse. Having gained his saddle, the hunter returned, and fought the bear from his saddle till he killed him.

On the first settlement of California a Mexican came across a grizzly, and lassoed him, thinkiug he could choke him to death; he was disagreeably surprised to find the bear hauling in both himself and his horse by the lasso, hand over hand, as a sailor takes a pull at the haulyards, (ha'lyards,) and he was glad to draw a knife and sever the connection.

The cubs, when young, are tree-climbers; later in life their claws unfit them for this; so that, if a hunter can gain a tree, he is safe.

A gigantic friend of mine—he stood nearly six feet seven inches high, and was stout in proportion—was an untiring hunter. When the gold fever broke out he caught the infection, and went to California; he made two competencies, and lost them by the fires which broke out in the early settlement of San Francisco. A third time he made $15,000, or, in English money, £3,000. Determined to save this, he sold his stock of goods, and after remitting his "rocks" to a bank in New Orleans, and whilst waiting for a vessel to sail to Panama, he was persuaded to join a hunting party. Whilst on this hunt he wounded, and was awfully mangled by a grizzly bear. He came home to Texas and married a young lady—I was myself present at the wedding; in three months he was buried, never having recovered from the encounter. I should state here that his was a love match, and it was to enable him to marry that he had at first gone to California; and he married his wife to secure to her his property, though he thoroughly knew, and in fact told me previous to the ceremony, that he felt he was not destined to see the new year, then some four months distant.

It is rather extraordinary that the grizzly bear will not molest a sleeping man; the Indians, who are close observers, say that a man reclining upon the ground is "medicine to the meeshek musquaw."

The female has rarely more than three cubs, and there has been no instance where she has failed to defend them; the male, too, takes his full share of their mutual responsibility, and it is supposed that the female and male pair to a greater extent than amongst most other animals, behaving quite unlike a bear, in this respect at least.

Amongst all the Indian tribes, a successful encounter with a grizzly bear counts equal to that of killing a warrior on the war-path, a necklace of the claws forming an honorable badge quite equal to our Victoria Cross. At first I was surprised that even a victory over the common black bear was so much thought of, as with us we do not consider it much more than killing a deer. I account for it amongst them as being led by tradition: when they killed a bear with the simple bow and arrow, and without the aid of hounds, it was an exploit, whilst we use the latter and fire-arms. With the grizzly bear, whether it is an Indian or a Gordon Cumming, it is a victory to be written by the hunter in letters of gold.

That the grizzly attacks any odds is proved by Dr. Richardson in the following narrative: "A party of voyageurs, who had been employed all day in tracking a canoe up the Saskatchewan, had seated themselves in the twilight by a fire, and were busy in preparing their supper, when a large grizzly bear sprang over the canoe that was tilted behind them, and seizing one of the party by the shoulder, carried him off. The rest fled in terror, with the exception of an Indian, named Bourasso, who, grasping his gun, followed the bear as it was retreating leisurely with its prey. He called to his unfortunate comrade that he was afraid of hitting him if he fired at the bear; but the latter entreated him to fire away without hesitation, as the bear was squeezing him to death. On this, he took a deliberate aim, and discharged his piece into the body of the animal, which instantly dropped its prey to pursue Bourasso. He escaped with difficulty, and the bear ultimately retreated to a thicket, where it was supposed to have died; but the curiosity of the party not being a match for their fears, the fact of its decease was not ascertained. The man who was rescued had his arm fractured, and was otherwise severely bitten, but finally recovered. I have seen Bourasso, and can add that the account which he gives is fully credited by the traders resident in that trading region, who are best qualified to judge of the truth from their knowledge of the parties."

A thousand bear-stories might be told, a hundred narrow escapes, and yet the history of the Ursus ferox remains to be told. Seen casually, always as an antagonist, amongst mountains and ravines, in an unsettled region, little is known except that it fights to the bitter end—no chance, so far, that it should ever be tamed, though it may be caught.—English Magazine.

RAILWAY TRAVELLING IN INDIA.—The new sleeping carriages on this part of the line (from Benares to Calcutta) are a curiosity. They are comfortable and easy for one person in the mild season of the year, but in the hot weather must be unbearably close and stifling. The carriage is divided into four compartments, each provided with a cushioned sofa fit for one person; at the further end a door opens into a little bath-room, where cold water and other conveniences are attainable. For ladies travelling alone or with very young children, or for invalids, these carriages are invaluable. Excellent arrangements are now made at all the refreshment places. One Kellner, of Calcutta, has taken a coutract, or made a contract; at any rate he has the monopoly. The refreshment-rooms all down the lines are now nicely lighted up with lamps, the provisions supplied are good, and everything clean and comfortable. There has been an immense improvement in this respect, and you can now depend on getting a decent dinner, or tiffin, or breakfast all down the liue at moderate charges. At many of the stations down below Beuares they have excellent draught beer on tap; you can also purchase railway novels and such trash, at an increase, of course, upon the home price, and other things useful to a traveller. On the whole, Kellner is a decided step in civilization aud deserves a medal.—Delhi Gazette.

NEW CHEMICAL AGENT IN WARFARE.—Chloride of nitrogen will, it is said, soon be utilized as an implement of war. Its employment would seem likely to put an end to all war. Mr. Isham Baggs, chemist, in announcing his discovery, proposes to carry up his composition in balloons, and drop it from the air in the midst of armies and fortresses. "The very mention of this compound," he goes on to say, "as a proposed elemeut in modern warfare, may possibly provoke a smile among chemists, who know that the most accomplished among their number would scarcely dare to experiment with it in quantities larger than a grain of mustard seed, and even then at a respectful distance, and under guard at the moment of its detonation. And yet not one of those chemists will be bold enough to deny that two or three chemically clean carboys of this terrible compound present in a city or fortress, however strong, the slightest cuttings of phosphorus or a single drop of olive oil coming in contact with it, would, in one instant, decide the fate of the place and its inhabitants." Mr. Baggs then proceeds to affirm that he has discovered a method of overcoming the contingent difficulties, and that he is able to manufacture this deadly material with perfect safety, and in any required quantity, and that it can be safely conveyed to its destination.

Poverty is the only load which is the heavier the more loved ones there are to assist in supportiug it.

LIFE ON A BLOCKADER.

FROM an article in the Continental Monthly for July, evidently written by some one who has seen service off the Southern coast, we make the following excerpts:

THREATENED BY A FRIEND.

Our vessel, of some 1,300 tons, and manned by a crew of about 200 all told, reached blockade ground the early part of March. Our voyage down the coast had been unmarked by any special incident, and when at dusk, one spring afternoon, we descried a faint blue line of land in the distance, and knew it as the enemy's territory, speculation was rife as to the prospect of prizes. About 11 P. M. a vessel hove in sight, which, as it neared, proved to be a steamer of about half our tonnage. Our guns were trained upon the craft, but, instead of running, she steamed up toward us. We struck a light, but it was as loth to show its brightness as the ancient bushel-hidden candle. A rope was turpentined, and touched with burning match, but the flame spread up and down the whole spiral length of the rope torch, to the infinite vexation of the lighter. Fierce stampings and fiercer execrations swiftly terrorized the trembling quartermaster, who, good fellow, did his best, and then, frightened into doing something desperate, made this blaze. We hailed them while waiting for fire to throw signals, letting them know who we were; but the wind carried away our shoutings, and the vessel actually seemed inclined to run us down. Worse yet—what could the little vixen mean?—a bright light, flashed across her decks, showed gathering round her guns a swift-moving band of men. Her crew were training their guns upon us for our swift capture or destruction: she could not see our heavy weight of metal, for our ports were closed. She might be a friend, for so her signal lights seemed to indicate; but if of our fleet, how should we let her know in time to save the loss of life and irreparable harm a single ball from her might do? She had waited long enough for friendly signals from us, and the wind, which swept our shouts from hearing, brought to us from them, first, questions as to who we were, then threats to fire if we did not quickly tell, and then orders passed to the men at the foremost gun: "One point to the starboard train her!"—words which made their aim on us more sure and fatal. "Bear a hand on that fire and torch! Be quick, for God's sake, or we'll have a shot through us, and that from a friend, unless we blaze away like lightning with our rockets." The crew were stepping from the gun to get out of the way as it was fired; the captain of the gun held the lock string in his hand; but the instant had not been lost, and our rockets, springing high in air, told our story. Danger is past: we learn they are not only friends, but to be neighbors, and steam in together to our post rather nearer the shore than other vessels here.

REBEL BATTERIES.

Days pass on in watching, and as yet no foreign sail. We study the line of our western horizon, and find it well filled in with forts, embrasures, earthworks, black-nosed dogs of war, and busy traitors. As time goes on, a new thing opens to the view: a short week ago it seemed but a mole-hill: now it has risen to the height of a man, and hourly increases in size. Two weeks, and now its summit is far above the reach of spade or shovel throw, and crowned by a platform firmly knit and held together by well-spliced timbers. As to its object we are somewhat dubious, but think it the beginning of an earthwork fortress, built high in order that guns may be depressed and brought to bear on the turrets of any Monitors which might possibly come down upon this place or Wilmington.

At night we drew nearer to the shore, watching narrowly for blockade runners, which evade us occasionally, but oftener scud away disappointed. One night or early morning, 3 A. M. by the clock, we tried to heave up anchor; the pin slipped from the shackles, and the anchor, with forty fathoms of chain attached, slipped and sank to the bottom in some eight fathoms of water.

The next day we steamed into our moorings of the previous night and sought to drag for it. While arranging to do so, we saw a puff of smoke from the shore. Bang! and a massive cannon ball tore whizzing over our heads. The shore batteries had us in their range, and the firing from the far-reaching Whitworth guns grows more rapid. Puff after puff rolls up from the long line of battery-covered hillocks, under the bastard flag, and the rolling thunder peals on our ears with the whizzing of death-threatening balls. Oh! the excitement of watching and wondering where the next ball will strike, and whether it will crush a hole right through us, wasting rich human life, and scattering our decks with torn-off limbs and running pools of blood. Quickly as possible we up anchor and away, and soon are out of reach of balls, which splash the water not a ship's length from us. Even then we involuntarily dodge behind some pine board or other equally serviceable screen; and a newspaper, if that were nearest, would be used for the same purpose—so say those who have tasted many a naval fight. In fact, the dodge is as often after the ball has hit as before, as this story of one of our brave quartermaster's will prove: Under fire from rebel batteries, he noted the cloud of smoke which burst from one of the fort's embrasures—watched sharply for the ball—heard the distant roar and its cutting whiz overhead—watched still further, saw it fall into the sea beyond, and then sang out to the captain, "There it fell, sir!" and like lightning dodged behind a mast, as though the necessity had but just occurred to him.

As our rebel friends see their shot falling short of us, the firing ceases, and thus harmlessly ends the action which for a few moments threatened so much, teaching us the folly of too near approaches to land, or attempts to batter down, to which we have often been tempted, the earthworks daily erecting. It is folly to attempt it, because the disabling of these few blockade steamers would open the port to all who choose to barter with our Southern foes; and, en passant, this will explain why here and elsewhere the rebels build their works under the very noses of our men-of-war. Thus a vessel runs the blockade, and takes into them English Whitworth guns, which send balls flying through the air a good five miles, and whose range is longer than our far-famed Parrott rifled cannon. These Whitworths they place concealed in hillsides, or in forests back of the places where they build the regular fort to protect them. If our vessels approach to batter down these germs of forts, fire is opened on us from these long rangers, and nine chances out of ten we are disabled before we can so much as touch them with our guns; so that for ourselves we accomplish nothing, thereby benefiting them.

THE DAILY DRILL.

The first few days can be taken up in sight-seeing on board, and the most novel of these said sights is the drill which follows the daily call to quarters. The rapid roll of the drum is the signal: here, there, everywhere, on berth deck, spar deck, quarter deck, men spring to feet, jump from their hammocks, and every door and passage way is blocked up by the crowd, who rush to their respective quarters, and about the armory, each seeking to be the first, who, fully equipped with cutlass, gun and sabre-bayonet affixed, shall be in his place. Another instant, and all stand about their several guns in rows awaiting orders from their officers, who sing out in clear commanding tones, as though a real fight was impending: "Pass 9-inch shell and load!" They drive it home. "Now run out! train her two points off port quarter; elevate for five hundred yards! Fire! Run her in! Run out starboard gun! Run her home! Train her three points off starboard quarter! Fire!"

High up on the bridge of the hurricane deck, stands the first lieutenant, overlooking the men as they work the guns, train, load, run out, and mimic fire. Suddenly he shouts through the trumpet: "Boarders and pikemen at port quarter! First boarders advance! Second boarders advance! Repel boarders! Retreat boarders! Pikemen cover cutlass division! Fire! Repel boarders!" The second hand scarcely sweeps over a quarter of its dial before the men have crowded around the port bulwarks, and are slashing the air with a most Quixotic fury—then crouch on bent knee, to make ready their pistols, while in the rear, marines and pikemen, musket and rifle armed, snap their pieces, and pour into an imaginary foe a vast volley of imaginary balls, then pierce the air with savage bayonet thrusts. The farce, and yet a most useful farce, is gone through with. The retreat is ordered to be beat, and all retire, refill the armory with their deadly rifles and side arms, and then return to their respective watches, work or recreation—some gathering round a canvass checker board; some polishing up bright work; others making pants, shirts or coats, or braiding light straw hats. Some are aloft, and watching with eager eyes to catch the first glimpse of a sail on the distant horizon; and this he must do from his lofty lookout before the officer of the deck or quartermaster espies one as they sweep the sky with their long-reaching glasses—else he may suffer reprimand or prison fare.

CHASING BLOCKADE RUNNERS.

As the sun goes down, the horizon is lit up with bonfires stretching along the coast for miles. "This fire means something," we say knowingly; "depend upon it, the rebs expect some vessel in to-night." Nothing came of it, however, though on the following afternoon we saw a steamer with two smoke-stacks come down the river and take a look, perhaps to see as to her chances of getting out that night. The twilight darkened into night, and night wore on into the small hours, and now we gazed into the gloom anxiously, for at this time if any she would seek to run out. A stranger passing along our decks, seeing in the darkness the shadowy forms of men crouched in listening attitudes, would have fancied himself among a body of Indians watching stealthily some savage prey. The night passes on; the grey dawn tells of the sun's approach, and soon his streaming splendor lights up sea and land. We look to see if our hoped-for prize still waits in the river, but no—she is not there. The day wears on and still no signs of her. If she has slipped us by, it is through the mouth and not the inlet, we feel sure, but still are chagrined, and, doubting the possibility of ever catching one, go to bed with the blues.

The next day we brighten up a little, to be saddened the more, for the Massachusetts on her return tells us that so far from there being good news from Charleston, we have only the worst to hear. The brave little Keokuk is riddled with balls and sunk, and the fleet of ironclads have retired from before the city. It is a costly experience though it may yet bear precious fruit, for they tell us it has revealed what was necessary to make our next attack successful. What it is we cannot learn, the authorities meaning in the future, doubtless, to wait till deeds have won them praise, before they make promises of great work.

Night draws on again, and we move in toward shore. Signal lights are burning, and huge bonfires, built behind the forests, that their glare may not light up the water, but their reflection against the background of the sky shows blockade runners the lay and bearings of the land. Something will surely be done to-night, and we keep vigilant watch. Two o'clock A. M., and a sound is heard, whether of paddle-wheels, surf on the beach, or blowing off of steam, we cannot tell. "It's paddle-wheels," says our ensign, and reports quickly to the captain. The first lieutenant springs on deck, a steam whistle is heard, so faint that only steam-taught ears know the sound, and word is passed to slip our chain and anchor, and make chase in the direction of the sound. They spring to the chain and work with a will to unshackle it quickly, but things are not as they should be; the hammer is not at hand, and the pins not fixed for speedy slipping out, even when struck a sharp, heavy blow. "I think I see a dark object off the direction of the sound we heard, sir," says some one. "Confound the chain! will it never unshackle?" they exclaim, as they seek to unloose it. At last it slips, we steam up, and are off in pursuit, but which way shall we turn, and where shall we chase? There is no guiding sound now, and we paddle cautiously on, spending the balance of the night in this blind work, feeling for the prize which has slipped from our fingers, for, as day dawns, we see a large steamer, safe under the walls of the fort. If disappointments make philosophers, we ought to rank with Diogenes.

The next day is filled with growls and "ifs" and "ands," and "if this had been so and so," and "but for that neglect, which we shall know how to avoid next time," etc., etc. The afternoon of another day comes on, and then a sail is descried, and off we go after it. Seven or eight miles' run brings us close to it; still it pays no attention, but keeps straight on. The captain orders a ball to be fired across her bows, which explodes so near as to splash jets of water over them. Her crew and captain strike sail, and let go halliards, while they fly behind masts, down cockpit, or wherever they can get for safety. Finding no further harm is meant than to bring them to, they answer back our hail—say they are going to Beaufort, quite a different direction from the one they are heading—and seem generally confused. As an excuse they say their compass is out of order, and as they appear to be wreckers, we allow them to go on without further molestation, and steam back to our moorings, consoling ourselves by the fact that these bootless chases are using up coal, and thereby hastening the time of our going to Beaufort to coal up, where we shall have a chance to step once more on terra firma.

Another night passes, and there are no indications of runners having tried to escape us; but at sunrise we see, far to the south, a schooner, and soon the flagship signals that a prize has been taken by one of our fleet. It looks very much like the schooner we let go yesterday, and our head officers swear, if it is that schooner, never to let another go so easily. One declares the vessel is loaded with cotton, and worth at least $100,000, but that, notwithstanding, he will sell his share for $500 in good gold. No one bids so high. Our ensign offers his for one dollar, and the paymaster sells his to the surgeon for fifty cents, the magnificence of which bargain the latter learns from the captain, who says his share will be about seven and a half cents! We steam alongside, and learn that our prize is the schooner St. George, bound for Wilmington, via the Bermudas, with a cargo of salt, saltpetre, etc., and worth perhaps $4,000. We send our prize list on board the flagship, and have a nice chat over the capture. It puts us in good humor, and our vessels chassée around each other till afternoon, when we separate, to hear shortly that the schooner, on being searched, has disclosed rich merchandise, gold, Whitworth guns, etc., hidden under her nominal cargo of salt. So hurra again for our prize list! This almost makes up for the loss of the steamer.

As we are on the point of letting go our anchor, the distant boom of cannon is heard, and the flagship orders us to repair to the seat of danger with all speed. We haste away, and as we go, hear a third gun fired. It comes from the direction of the brig Perry, and we cut through the water toward it, at a twelve-knot rate, for a good half hour, but hearing no more firing, put in near the shore to watch for the rebel vessel, as we think those guns were intended to put us on our guard. It soon grows dark; lights are ordered out, and each man blinds his port. No talking above a whisper must be heard; we are to be still as an arctic night. Midnight passes, and lights still flicker along the shore. It is so dark we cannot see the land, though not more than a mile from it, and only know what it is by our compass and bearings, and the fires which lighten up the clouds in spots right over them. One, two, and three o'clock have passed; no sail or sound yet, and the night so dark we cannot see a ship's length away. Half-past three, and we begin to heave anchor. The rattle of the chains is just enough to drown the sound of paddle-wheels should a steamer approach, and the sound of her own wheels would in turn drown our noise; so if one does run into land, it may be over us, for any warning we should have of its whereabout.

Suddenly the acting master jumps, looks for an instant across the bows into the thick darkness, and bids a boy report to the captain and lieutenant "a vessel almost on us." The man at the windlass is stopped, unshackles the chain, and lets the anchor go with a buoy attached. Captain and lieutenant come on deck, and order to blaze away with our fifty-pound Parrott. Crash! through the still air rings the sharp report, and the ball goes whizzing through the gloom, in the direction the vessel was seen. The bright flash of the gun, and the thick cloud of smoke make the darkness tenfold more impenetrable. For half an hour we chase in every direction, then fire again toward the shore. It is just 4; a gray light is working up through the mist, and we catch the faintest glimpse of the Daylight, one of our fleet. A few minutes later, and we see a speck near the shore, which the spyglass shows to be the steamer we chased and fired after in the night. The surf beats about her; in her frantic efforts to escape, she in the darkness has been run ashore by our close pursuit. We steam up, to get within range and destroy, if we cannot take her, when the Daylight, now discovering her, opens fire. Once, twice, three times she has banged away a broadside at the rebel sidewheel, and now the batteries on shore in turn open fire on her. The sea-fog hangs like a shroud over and between us and the land, which looms up mysteriously, stretching its gray length along the western horizon. Spots of fire bursting from the midst of it, tear through the fog-cloud right at us. It seems, in its vast, vague undefinedness, rather an old-time dragon, with mouth spouting fire and thunder, than harmless earth. The smoke of our own guns settles around us; our ears ring with our own firing: the excitement of the moment is intense. The jets of flame seem to spout right at once, and the inclination to dodge becomes very strong. The Daylight has stopped firing: what is the matter? The fog lifts slightly, and as the flagship advances to join in the fight, we see that the Daylight is moving back to reload and let her pass in, which she does, entering the circle of the rebel fire between us and them. She finds it out quickly, for their guns are brought to bear on her, and the balls strike the water frightfully near. She turns, but, as she she leaves the fiery circle, delivers, one after the other, a whole broadside of guns, followed by the Penobscot, who too gives them a few iron pills.

From 6 to 8 A. M., the vessels gather in a cluster at safe distance from the land, and the commanders of the different vessels repair on board the flagship to consult what next shall be done. Meanwhile the spyglass shows crowds of rebels along the shore, and great efforts seem to be making to get the steamer off. Puffs of steam and clouds of black smoke from her chimneys show that she is blowing off steam, firing up, and pushing hard against the shore. Now her paddle-wheels are working; her stern is afloat. Again and again it is reported, "She's getting herself off the beach; she'll soon be off!" but it does not appear to hasten the powers that be, who apparently have decided that, as it will not be high tide till nearly 1 P. M., she is safely aground till then.

HOW THE PRIZES ARE LOST.

Finally, after long delay, it is decided that all hands shall be piped to breakfast, and we go in for a regular fight afterward. So the boatswain blows his whistle, and each man goes to his mess. Breakfast is leisurely gone through with, and then the drum beats all to quarters. And now it looks like serious work. Men gather round their guns eager for battle, and the surgeon stands ready, instruments before him, for whatever may come. But hardly are they ready for the fight, when the rebel steamer, with its traitor flag floating high in air, has extricated itself from the beach, and is steaming down the coast as fast as it can go. The golden opportunity is lost—was lost when the morning hour was spent in unnecessary discussion, eating and drinking. Still they try to make up for lost time by rapid firing now, for she may be taking in a precious and comforting cargo of arms and other stores of war. The shots fall close about her, but a little short. Whitworth guns protect her as she goes, for our steamers dare not venture too near land, lest some long-range ball smash through their steam chests. The batteries from which the rebels fired were mostly erected after the steamer ran ashore, and seemed to consist principally of field pieces and guns hastily drawn to the spot, with no earthworks to protect them. This speedy work of theirs was in strong contrast to our slow motions. With a spyglass we could see telegraph poles stretched along the shore. The steamer had probably not been ashore one hour, when eight miles south to the fort, and eight or ten miles north to Wilmington, the news had spread of its arrival, and busy hands bestirred themselves, dragging up guns and ammunition to cover their stranded prize. As soon as sunlight lit up the beach, squads of men were seen pulling at ropes to work the vessel off the sandy beach. While they were thus engaged, breakfast was being quietly eaten on board our vessels! We kept up our fire till the steamer got under the guns of the fort and out of our reach, and then retired; and so ended our chase in nothing but noise and smoke. We have given the reader a clue to a little of the inefficiency of the Wilmington blockade.

STRAY JOKES.

WITH a little oatmeal for food, and a little sulphur for friction, allaying cutaneous irritation with the one hand, and holding his Calvinistical creed in the other, Sawney [the Scotchman] runs away to his flinty hills, sings his psalm out of tune his own way, and listens to his sermon two hours long, amid the rough and imposing melancholy of the tallest thistles.—Sidney Smith.

Dr. Johnson.—"Scotland is a miserable country—a contemptible country."

Scotchman.—"You cannot do the Almighty the injustice to say that; God made Scotland, sir."

Johnson.—"Yes, sir, he did make Scotland; but he made it for Scotchmen. God made Hell, also, sir."

A Mr. Gould had a habit of adding "on the contrary" to everything he said. A friend said to him "So I hear Gould, you eat three eggs every morning for breakfast?" "No" replied he, "you are mistaken; on the contrary—" "What the devil," said the friend, "does the contrary of eating three eggs mean?" Sheridan who was present suggested. "Laying them of course!"

A sickly woman fancied herself continually at death's door and frequently sent for her friends to see her die. One of them who had gone several times by special invitation and come away disappointed, at last refused to attend, pleading that he "could not afford to waste so much time on a mortuary uncertainty."

About 1845, a philanthropist whose sympathies were excited by surmising the future of the Indians in the district now known as Kansas and Nebraska, asked, "What will they do after the buffalo has been exterminated?" Prentice replied: "They will have to bear it."

Stranger (to man in carriage.)—"Will you have the kindness to take my overcoat in your carriage to town?"

Answer.—"With pleasure; but how will you get it again?"

Stranger.—"Oh, very easily; I shall remain in it."

Irish Judge (deciding a will case.)—It is very clear that the testator intended to reserve a life interest in the estate for himself."

Curran.—"Your honor takes the will for the deed."

Tooke (accused of treason.)—"Erskine, I shall make a speech in my own defence."

Erskine.—"If you do you'll be hanged."

Tooke.—"Then I'll be hanged if I do."

Brown (who had written a poem entitled "The Descent into Hell") to Jerrold.—"Have you read my 'Descent into Hell?"

Jerrold.—No; but I should like to see it."

An English lady on the Rhine, hearing a German speaking of her party as foreigners, exclaimed: "No, we are not foreigners; we are English; it is you that are foreigners!"

Sydney Smith taking leave of a quarrelsome clergyman who was going off as missionary to some South Sea Island, said: "I hope you will agree with the savage who eats you."

A rival editor named Long accused Prentice of falsehood, and asked, "When will this man learn to tell the truth?" Prentice replied, "I will learn it before Long."

George III. (to Horne Tooke).—"Can you play cards?"

Tooke.—"No, your Majesty, I don't know a knave from a king."

Lord Byron (groaning with agony from a severe attack of colic.)—"Lord, help me! I am dying!"

Trelawny.—"Don't make such an infernal fuss about dying."

Deacon (at dinner, to a stranger) "Stop, we are in the habit of saying something before we commence to eat."

Stranger.—"Go on; you can't turn my stomach."

Hood.—"Who built this bridge?"

Hook.—"Go over and you'll be tolled."

Squinting Man (to Talleyrand)—"Is your broken leg nearly well?"

Talleyrand.—No, it's quite crooked—as you see.

Noted Scoundrel—"I feel the torments of hell!"

Talleyrand—"Already?"

I shall now proceed to expose the character of my antagonist. I shall remove his mask and show his cloven foot.

I smell a rat; I see it brewing in the storm; I will crush it in the bud.

Congressman.—"What is the wages of sin?"

Street Boy.—$8 per day."

In Paris there is a sign, "Hotel de l'Univers et des Etats-Unis," [Hotel of the Universe and of the United States.]

Beggar.—"Madam, please to give me a drink, for I am so angry that I don't know where to sleep to-night."

London climate in a fine day is looking up a chimney, in a foul day is looking down one.—R. W. Emerson.

SIR WALTER SCOTT AND THE PRINCESS.

MY uncle gave me a curious account of the introduction of Mr. Scott to the Princess. Mrs. Hayman, in sending the invitation to my uncle, added a personal request that he would come early to protect the poet, (for as such only was he known,) who, she believed, would not know any one other guest. Scott arrived late, was only presented to the Princess just before she went to dinner; at table, his place was, of course, far removed from hers, and little, if any, conversation took place between them. Very soon after the gentlemen came up from dinner the Princess said: "Mr. Scott, I hear you have a great collection of stories which you tell remarkably well; pray let us hear one." Without any disclaiming speeches, without hesitation, almost without delay, Scott began: "Madam, there was once," etc. The story was much applauded; another was called for, and followed with equal facility. My uncle mentioned this as an extraordinary feat of self-possession and ready wit. I am certainly not inclined to doubt the extraordinary talents of Scott, but in this instance many circumstances appear to me to diminish the wonder. The trade of Scott in his character of London and Edinburgh lion was as decidedly at that period that of a teller of stories as it has since been that of a writer of novels. The tales had probably been told a hundred times; and on this occasion his friend Mrs. A. H., I doubt not, gave him a previous hint of what would be asked from him. Scott mentions this dinner in a letter to Mr. George Ellis, describing his visit to London, dated April 7, 1806: "I had also the honor of dining with a fair friend of yours at Blackheath, an honor which I shall long remember. She is an enchanting princess, who dwells in an enchanted palace; and I cannot help thinking her prince must lie under some malignant spell when he denies himself her society." His popularity dates from the publication of the Lay of the Last Minstrel, in 1805. At a later period, and after a long practice in being lionised, in 1809, he made extremely light of his own social accomplishments. "All this is very flattering," he would say to Mr. Morritt, "and very civil. If people are amused with hearing me tell a parcel of old stories, or recite a pack of ballads to lovely young girls and gaping matrons, they are easily pleased, and a man would be very ill-natured who would not give pleasure so cheaply conferred." Two years before, his absence of self-assumption was still more remarkable: "April, 1807. Mr. Scott, the author of the Lay, told us some curious border histories. We were much pleased with the conclusion of the history of Wat Tyn in. When he was grown old and blind, one of the agents of the Lady of Branksome in her absence called upon him for the rent of a small tower which he inhabited, part of which is standing to this day. Wat, incensed, replied he never had paid rent, nor would at that age. At last he delivered his bow to the steward, and said he would pay the rent to the man who could draw that bow. The bow was certainly tried, but we will hope that the lady would never have obliged such a man to pay his rent. However, certain it is that some vain attempts were made to draw his bow, and that Wat never paid his rent. Mr. Scott spoke of one story (the story of Muckle Mouth Mag) which might make an excellent ballad, but he said he could not write it so as to do it justice; much humor, he said—a quality he never possessed—was required."—"Diaries of a Lady of Quality," in the Edinburgh Review.

The London Polytechnic.—Lately I spent five hours at that most remarkable institution, I suppose, of the world, the "Polytechnic." It is an omnium gatherum if ever there was one. In it you find little engines in full whirl made after every pattern ever discovered; glass-blowing; miniature coal mines with little automaton miners, baskets and coal-cars at work; miniature Bengal jungles with lions emerging from lairs; a little ocean with islands traced down to the bottom, and the submarine telegraph cable that was, with ships tossing on the waves above; aquaria, pictures, statues; a large pool of water, into which a man descends with a case for his head and walks about; then gentlemen and ladies descending in a bona fide diving-bell; then lectures on science; ventriloquism; dissolving views; and ghosts in extraordinary quantity—for the Polytechnic is the home and workshop of Pepper, the inventor of the theatrical ghost. They make the ghost at the Polytechnic charmingly. On the afternoon that I was there the old Chronicle of St. Hubert watching his armor to win the golden spurs was read and accompanied by very beautiful tableaux vivants. The story, I believe, is from Froissart. It records that St. or Sir Hubert, to win his spurs—symbols of knighthood and securities of his marriage with his fair Agnes—must needs watch through the night to see that his armor was borne off by no demon—under oath to eat, drink, accept nothing, until the watch was over. He is successively tempted by the demon in the form of a monk offering him wine and to watch for him whilst he slept; then of a beautiful nymph who promises him a kingdom if he will go with her; then of a merchant who offers him gold, taunting him with the poverty to which he will bring his Agnes, (the temptation which nearly succeeds,) but he conquers, and the various tempters, which are but spirits, melt into thin air as they are vanquished. Whoever comes to London, let him begin with the Polytechnic!—London Correspondence.

Thackeray and the Harpers.—The following story, the invention of a London newspaper, is going the rounds of our journals:

Shortly after his first lauding in America, Thackeray was invited to dinner by one of the Messrs. Harper, the well-known publishing firm, whose magazine, Harper's Monthly, is a deliberate compilation from all the best English periodicals. On his introduction to Mr. Harper, Thackeray had joked with him on the American contempt for copyright; and when he went into the drawing-room he took a little girl, whom he found playing there, on his knee, and gazing at her with feigned wonder, said, in solemn tones, "And this is a pirate's daughter!"

Among the artists announced by the Italian musical papers as disengaged for the coming operatic season, are Gazzauiga, Poinsot, Tombesi the little tenor, and Gnone the baritone.

Masters a little blind and servants a little deaf get along together admirably.

A Large Lemonade.—A number of years ago, during a session of the New England Yearly Meeting of Friends at Newport, Rhode Island, a certain Quaker of the "free and easy" sort, from abroad, early one morning, feeling a "hankering" after something stronger than cold water or the smell of the sea-breeze, wandered into a basement-saloon on Thames street, determined to have something "cheering." A boy about twelve years of age, the only occupant of the place, stood behind the bar, evidently ready to wait on customers.

"Boy, dost thou attend here?" asked the Friend.

"Yes, sir-ee—about six days in the week," he replied with a consequential air.

"Can thou make a lemonade?"

"Yes, and put a 'stick' in it if you like!"

"Well, thou may make me one; but I will give theo directions how to proceed. Now take one of thy largest tumblers and squeeze a lemon into it."

The boy immediately took a pint-glass from the shelf and complied with the Quaker's request.

"Now, thou may fill it about half full with thy best brandy; then put in three or four spoonsful of sugar, and fill up the tumbler with water."

The juvenile bar-tender followed these directions in every particular, while his tutor stood rubbing his hands with pleasure as he anticipated the richness of the draught the boy was concocting. When it was ready, Broadbrim raised it to his lips and quaffed it with the gusto of one who was indulging in his favorite beverage. After paying for the drink, he patted the boy patronizingly on the shoulder, exclaiming as he did so, with an occasional smack of his lips:

"Thou art a small boy; but thou makes a large lemonade!"

A New Art.—Photography has, in Paris, just given birth to what must be considered a new art. It is called by its inventor, M. Willeme, photo-sculpture. It is a method of preparing with the minute accuracy of photography, busts of living persons in plaster. Some specimens exhibited on Regent street, in London, have created quite a sensation. M. Claudet, the London agent, explains the process as follows: The person whose bust or statue is to be taken is placed in the centre of a circular apartment, forty feet in diameter, and twenty-four cameræ obscuræ are placed along the wall at equal distances from each other. By means of a latch, which raises and drops the slides simultaneously, twenty-four photographs of the many sided sitter are taken at once, there being six front, six back and twelve side views. The negative of one of the portraits is then placed in a magic-lantern, and the image it holds projected upon a large sheet of rough glass. The block of clay is then placed on a revolving stand, the circumference of which is divided into twenty-four parts. A pantograph is then employed, by which the clay is cut exactly to represent the outline on the glass. When one photograph has been copied the image of the next is placed in the lantern, and the clay is turned round one-twenty-fourth of the circle. The result is that the block of clay exhibits twenty-four sides or facets, representing the twenty-four photographs. The bust then only needs a little finishing and polishing to be quite perfect.

The Schoolmaster not Abroad.—Several years ago, when the efforts in behalf of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association were at the height of their activity throughout the country, Mrs. —— was one of the local agents to collect funds in our town. In the prosecution of her labors she called at a comfortable-looking dwelling in the outskirts of her district, and the head of the family being absent, she addressed the "lady of the house" in an eloquent appeal in behalf of the Association. To her surprise she was asked: "Why, who is Mr. Washington?" Astonished at discovering such density of ignorance on the part of a well-to-do woman in this land of enlightenment, Mrs. —— briefly but forcibly recapitulated the leading events in Washington's career, and his claims upon his country's gratitude, in recognition of which, as she explained, an effort was being made to raise funds to prevent his home from passing into the hands of strangers. But the answer showed that, notwithstanding the efforts of the teacher, the student of history didn't yet see the point. "Well, ma'am," said the latter, "I should like very much to help that good old man to keep his place, if I could afford it, but fact is, that we ha'n't yet paid for ourn!"

Petit Pape, the Piano Prodigy.—Another American prodigy is now winning fame in England—young Willie Pape, the Mobile pianist, who has been appointed pianist to the Princess of Wales, which does not mean at all that he plays every day before that lady, or that he gives her lessons, or is a favored guest at her table, but simply that he has performed once in her hearing, and that as a piece of great condescension he is allowed to place on his cards the words "Pianist to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales." This condescension, however, secures to him the patronage of Mrs. Jarley's friends, "the nobility and gentry," and little Willie Pape now gives his "annual concert" at Hanover-square Rooms, before the élite of England. His immense repertoire of selections, played from memory, equals or surpasses that of any other pianist who has ever visited England; and to this add a quiet modesty, and, if the almost paradoxical expression may be allowed, a boyish dignity, and it is not surprising that Willie Pape is to-day one of the most popular concert-performers in all England.

Telegraphic Operations.—A man who wanted to send a despatch to the outskirts of West Meriden, Connecticut, got very much excited in the telegraph office in Springfield the other day, because the operator told him it could go no further by telegraph than the office at that place. He insisted that the wire ran close to the house where the message was going, and the operator should have it drop off there. Another deluded individual recently brought in a sealed letter to send by telegraph, and thought he was very much imposed upon when he was told it must be opened in order to be transmitted. Of the same mind was a blooming maid of Erin, who wished to telegram to "Mrs. Murphy in Boston," but who had not a word written; and when asked to state what she wished in her message, innocently inquired: "Can't you send it without knowin' the contents?"

AIR—"I'm sitting on the stile, Mary."

I'M shtanding in the mud, Biddy,
With not a spalpeen near,
And silence, spachless as the grave,
Is all the sound I hear.
Me goon is at a showlder-arms,
I'm wetted to the hone,
And whin I'm afther sphakin' out,
I find meself alone.

This Southern climate 's quare, Biddy,
A quare and hastely thing,
Wid winter absint all the year,
And summer in the spring.
Ye mind the hot place down below?
And mry ye niver fear
I'd dhraw comparisons—but then
It's awful warrum here.

The only moon I see, Biddy,
Is one shmall star, asthore,
And that 's forninst the very clond
It was behind before;
The watch-fires glame along the hill
That's swellin' to the south,
And whin the sintry passes them,
I see his ougly mouth.

It's dead for shlape I am, Biddy,
And dramein' shwate I d be,
If them ould Rebels over there
Would only lave me free;
But when I lane against a shtump
And shtrive to get repose,
A musket ball be's comin' shtraight
To hit me spacious nose.

It's ye I'd like to see, Biddy,
A shparkin here wid me,
And then, avourneen, hear ye say,
"Acushla—Pat—machree!"
"Och, Biddy, darlint," then says I,
Says you, "get out of that."
Says I, "me arrum mates your waist,'
Says you, "Be dayeent, Pat."

And how's the pigs and dncks, Biddy?
It's them I think of shure,
That looked so innocent and shwate
Upon the parlor-flure;
I'm shure ye 're aisy with the pig,
That's fat as be can be,
And fade him wid the best, because
I'm towld he looks like me.

Whin I come home again, Biddy,
A sargent tried and thrue,
It's joost a dayeent house I'll build,
And rint it chupe to you.
We'll have a parlor, bedroom, hall,
A dnck-pond nately done,
With kitchen, pig-pen, praty-patch,
And garret, all in one.

But, murther! there's a baste, Biddy,
That's crapia' round a tree,
And well I know the cratur's there
To have a shot at me.
Now, Misther Rebel, say yer pray'rs,
And howld yer dirty paw,
Here goes!—he jabers, Biddy, dear,
I've broke his oogly jaw!

THE NOTTING HILL MYSTERY.

IT is unnecessary for us to state by what means the following papers came into our hands, and it would be no compliment to the penetration of our readers if we indicated beforehand the nature of the mystery they are supposed to unravel. It will, however, require a very close attention to names and dates to comprehend the view of the compiler, as to the case he is investigating; and, so far, it is requisite to rely on the reader's patience and discernment. The whole particulars of the case will extend to some seven or eight numbers, and some things which are dark at first will appear clearer in the sequel. If the compiler has really discovered a new species or description of crime, it is natural that the evidence of it, which is circumstantial, should be somewhat difficult of acceptance:

Mr. R. Henderson to the Secretary of the ——— Life Assurance Association:

"PRIVATE ENQUIRY OFFICE, CLEMENT'S INN, 17th January, 1858.

"GENTLEMEN.—In laying before you the extraordiuary revelations arising from my examinatiou into the case of the late Madame R, I have to apologise for the delay in carrying out your instructions of November last. It has been occasioned, not by any neglect on my part, but by the unexpected extent and intricacy of the enquiry into which I have been led. I confess that after this minute and laborious investigation I could still have wished a more satisfactory result, but a perusal of the accompanying documeuts, on the accuracy aud completeness of which you may fully rely, will, I doubt uot, satisfy you of the unusual difficulty of the case.

"My enquiries have had reference to a policy of assurance for £5,000, the maximum amount permitted by your rules, on the life of the late Madame R, effected in your office by her husband, the Baron R, aud bearing date 1st November, 1855. Similar policies were held in the —— of Manchester, the —— of Liverpool, the —— of Edinburgh, and the —— of Dublin, the whole amounting to £25,000; the dates, 23d December, 1855, 10th January, 25th January, and 15th February, 1856, respectively, being in effect almost identical. These compauies joined in the instructions under which I have beeu acting; and, from the volumiuous nature of this letter and its enclosures, I shall be obliged by your considering my present reply as addressed to them conjointly with yourselves.

"Before entering upon the subject of my investigations, it may be as well to recapitulate the circumstances under which they were originated. Of these the first was the coincidence of dates, above noticed; and an apparent desire on the part of the assurer to conceal from each of the various offices the fact of similar policies having been elsewhere simultaneously effected. On examining further into the matter your Board was also struck with the peculiar conditions under which the marriage appeared to have taken place, and the relation in which Madame R had formerly stood to the Baron. To these points, therefore, my attention was especially directed, and the facts thus elicited form a very important link in the singular chain of evidence I have been enabled to put together.

"The chief element of suspicion, however, was to be found in the very unusual circumstances atteudant ou the death of Madame R, especially following so speedily as it did on the assurance for so large an aggregate amount. This lady died suddenly on the 15th March, 1857, from the effects of a powerful acid taken, it is supposed, in her sleep, from her husband's laboratory. In the Baron's answers to the usual preliminary inquiries, forwarded for my assistance, and herewith returned, there is no admission of any propensity to somnambulism. Shortly, however, after the occurrence had been noticed in the public priuts, a letter to the Secretary of the Association from a gentleman recently lodging in the same house with Baron R, gave reason to suspect that, in this respect, at least, some concealment had been practised, and the matter was then placed iu my hands.

"On receipt of your instructions, I at once put myself in communication with Mr. Aldridge, the writer of the letter in question. That gentleman's evidence certainly goes to show that, within at least a very few months after the date of the latest policy, Baron R was not only himself aware of such a propensity in his wife, but desirous of concealing it from others. Mr. Aldridge's statements are also to a certain exteut supported by those of two other witnesses; but, unfortunately, there are, as will be seen, circumstances calculated to throw considerable doubt upon the whole of this evidence, and especially on that of Mr. Aldridge, from which alone the more important part of the inference is drawn. The same must, unfortunately, be said with regard to some other parts of the evidence, as will be more clearly seen when the case itself is before you.

"From his statement, however, in conjunction with other circumstances, I learned enough to induce me to extend my researches to another very singular case, which not long since had given rise to considerable comment.

"You will, no doubt, remember that in the autumn of 1856 a gentleman of the name of Audertou was arrested on suspiciou of having poisoned his wife, and that he committed suicide whilst awaiting the issue of a chemical inquiry into the cause of her death. This inquiry resulted in an acquittal, no traces of the suspected poison being found; and the affair was hushed up as speedily as possible, many of Mr. Anderton's connections being of high standing iu society, and naturally anxious for the honor of the family. I must, however, acknowledge the readiness with which, in the interest of justice, I have been furnished by them with every facility for pushing my inquiries, the results of which are now before you.

"In reviewing the whole facts, and more especially the series of remarkable coincidences of dates, etc., to which I beg to direct your most particular attention, two alternatives present themselves. In the first we must altogether ignore a chain of circumstantial evidence so complete and close-fitting in every respect, as it seems almost impossible to disregard; in the second, we are inevitably led to a conclusion so at variance with all the most firmly established laws of nature, as it seems almost equally impossible to accept. The one leaves us precisely at the point from which we started; the other involves the imputatiou of a series of most horrible and complicated crimes.

"Between these alternatives I am constrained to confess my own inability, after long and careful study, to decide. I have determined, therefore, simply to submit for your consideration the facts of the case as they appear in the depositions of the several parties from whom my information has been obtained. These I have arranged, so far as possible, in the form in which they would be laid before counsel, should it ultimately be deemed advisable to bring the affair into Court. In view, however, of the extreme length of the case, I have given, in a condensed form, the substance of such of the depositions as did not seem likely to suffer from such treatment. The more important I have left to tell their own tale, and, in any case, my abstract may be at once checked by the originals, all of which are enclosed.

"Should your conclusions be such as have been forced upon myself, further deliberation will yet be required with reference to the course to be pursued; a point ou which, in such case, I confess myself almost equally unable to advise. Whether in a matter so surrounded with suspicion, it might not be well, in any event, to resist the claim, is certainly a question to be considered On the other hand, even assuming the fullest proof of the terrible crimes involved, it is a matter calling for no less careful consideration, whether they would be found of a nature to bring the criminal within reach of the law. For the present, however, our concern is with the facts of the case, and ulterior questions had better be left on one side until that issue is decided, when, I conclude, I shall hear further from you on the subject.

"In conclusion, I must trouble you with a few words on a point which seems to require explanation. I allude to the apparent prominence I have been compelled to afford to the workings of what is called 'Mesmeric Agency.' Those, indeed, who are so unfortunate as to be the victims of this delusion, would doubtless find in it a simple, though terrible solution of the mystery we are endeavoring to solve. But while frankly admitting that it was the passage from the Zoist Magazine, quoted in the course of the evidence, which first suggested to my mind the only conclusion I have as yet been able to imagine, I beg at the outset most distinctly to state, that I would rather admit my own researches to have been baffled by an illusory coincidence, than lay myself open to the imputation of giving the slightest credit to that impudent imposture. We must not, however, forget that those whose lives have been passed in the deception of others, not unfrequently end by deceiving themselves. There is, therefore, nothing incredible in the idea that the Baron R may have given sufficient credence to the statement of the Zoist, above-mentioned, for the suggestion to his own mind of a design, which by the working of a true, though most mysterious, law of Nature, may really have been carried out. Such, at least, is the only theory by which I can attempt, in any way, to elucidate this otherwise unfathomable mystery.

"Awaiting the honor of your further commands,
"I am, gentlemen, very faithfully yours,
"RALPH HENDERSON."

"Oh, auntie, auntie, what shall I do? For three nights I have not closed my eyes, and I would not write even to you, auntie dear, because I kept hoping that, after all, things might come right, and he would come round again. Oh, how I have listened to every sound, and watched the road till my poor eyes ache! And now this is the fourth day since he went away, and, oh, auntie, I am so frightened, for I am sure he is gone after that dreadful man, and, oh, if he should meet him, I know something terrible will happen, for you can't tell how he looked—poor Edward, I mean—when he went away. But, indeed, auntie, you must not be angry with him, for I know it was all my own fault, for I ought to have told him everything long ago, though indeed, indeed, I never cared for him, and I do love dear Edward so dearly. I was afraid . . . .

"BEECHWOOD, Tuesday night.

"MY DEAR CATHERINE.—I fear I have but a poor account to give you of our dear Gertrude. Poor child! when I came into the room, and saw her looking so pale and wan, and with great black circles round her eyes, I could scarcely keep in my own tears. She gave a cry of joy when she saw me, and threw herself upon my neck; but a moment after, turned to the writing table and tore open the letter I send you with this, and which was lying ready for the post. The long-continued strain seems to have been too much for her, and she had hardly written a line when her head began to wander, as you will see from the conclusion of her postscript, and in trying to write her husband's name she broke down altogether, and went off into a fit of hysterics which lasted for several hours. She is now, I am thankful to say, comparatively calm again, though at times her head still wanders, and she seems quite unable to close her eyes, but lies in her bed looking straight before her, aud occasionally talking to herself in a low voice, but without seeming to notice anything. I have endeavored, as far as I dared, to draw from her the history of this sad affair, but can get nothing, poor child, but eager assurances that it 'was all her fault' and that 'indeed, indeed, he was not to blame.' It seems as though my coming—though certainly a great relief to her—had had the effect of putting her on her guard, lest anything should escape her unfavorable to her husband, and her whole faculties seem to be concentrated in the endeavor to shield him from reproach. I fear, however, there can be uo doubt that he has been very seriously to blame; indeed from all I can gather, the fault seems to have been entirely on his side. What is the precise history of this unhappy business I have not been able to learn, but it seems that Sir Edward, who is certainly a most violent young man, and I fear also of a most jealous temperament, contracted some suspicion with regard to that Mr. Hawker who so perseveringly persecuted poor Gertude the winter before last, and to have left Beechwood, after a very distressing scene, in pursuit of hiu. Mr. Hawker is supposed to be on the Continent, and it is knowu that Sir Edward took the Dover road, which, as you know, passes close by this place. This is all I can at present learn with any certainty, though I hear but too much from the servants, who are all in such a state of indignation at Sir Edward's treatment of their mistress, that I have the greatest difficulty in restraining it from finding some open vent. Should I hear more I will of course let you know at once; but meanwhile I cannot conceal from you my deep anxiety for our dear Gertrude, whose poor heart seems quite broken, and for whom I am in hourly dread of the effect but too likely to be produced in her present delicate state, by the anxiety and terror from which she is suffering. . . . . You know how much I always disliked the match, and I feel more than ever the impropriety of consigning so young and sensitive a girl to the care of a man of such uotoriously uncontrollable temper. Poor thing! this is evidently not the first time she has suffered from it, and even should she herself escape without permanent injury to her constitution, I dread the effect upon the child. . . . . And now I must close this long and sad letter, but will write again should anything fresh occur; meanwhile I cannot be longer away from Gertrude's side. I hope your own health is improving. My love to little Henry and tell him to be good while I am away. "Your affectionate

"BERCHWOOD, Monday morning.

"MY DEAR CATHERINE.—I am sorry to say I can still send you no better account of poor Gertrude. Since I last wrote by Saturday evening's post very little change has taken place though she is certainly more restless, poor child, and I fear also, if anything, weaker. She now constantly asks for letters and seems impressed with the idea that we are keeping them from her, as indeed, in her present state, I should, I think, take the responsibility of doing, if any arrived. The newspaper I have always kept from her until it has first been carefully examined. I am dreading fever, though by the doctor's advice I have not attempted to dissuade her from getting up. The exertion, however, is almost more than she can bear and I am looking anxiously for his next visit. She lies all day on the sofa looking out of the window, which commands a view of the Dover road. This morning she seems growing more and more restless, and I am waiting with inexpressible anxicty for Dr. Travers.

* Great-aunt of the late Mrs. Anderton. The object of going so far back will presently appear.

"Eleven o'clock.

"The doctor has been in, and confirms my fear of approaching fever, which, however, he says may possibly pass off. He has ordered me to lie down at once for some hours, as I have hardly been in bed since I arrived, and he says if fever should come on I shall want all the strength I can get. I shall keep this letter open, to send you by the evening's post the latest account.

"Wednesday.

"All is over. I can hardly command myself sufficiently to write, and yet I must tell you what has happened. Oh, my dear Catherine, how shall I ever forgive myself for leaving poor dear Gertrude; and yet I know that this is foolish, for I was ordered to do so for her sake. But I must come at once to the sad news I have to tell. I left poor Gertrude in the charge of her maid, with strict injunctions to call me if there should be any change; but the poor child seems suddenly to have grown quicter, and at length to have fallen asleep. The maid watched her till just 4 o'clock, when, overcome with weariness, she herself dropped off into a doze, and on waking at a little before 5, was horrified to find herself alone. She flew at once to me, but I had hardly got to the top of the stairs when some one came running up to say that the postman was below, and had just met with poor Gertrude, who had been watching for him at the gate. She enquired eagerly after letters, and on being told there were none, asked for the newspaper, which she at once hurried away with into a part of the grounds called the Wilderness, while the postman, fearing from her manner that something was amiss, came on to the house to tell what had occurred. I need not tell you with what anxiety I hastened to the Wilderness, and there, poor girl, we found her, stretched upon the turf close by the edge of the lake, with the fatal newspaper in her hand. I had her taken carefully to the house, and a man despatched on horseback for the doctor, but before he arrived she had recovered consciousness, only, poor child, to be at once seized with the signs of her approaching trouble. From that moment until she breathed her last—an hour ago—I have never left her side. After nearly thirty hours of the most terrible suffering I have ever witnessed, she at length gave birth to two poor little girls, both so small and weak-looking that it is quite pitcous to see them. The elder in especial, which was born about an hour before the second, is so weak and sickly, that the doctor says it is scarcely possible it can live, and, indeed, one can hardly hope that it may. The second seems stronger, but both are very small and weakly even considering their premature birth.

"Poor Gertrude now sank rapidly, and though every means was tried, and she still lingered on for three or four hours, she at last sank altogether, passing away at the last so quietly that we hardly knew that she was gone. Poor darling, I always loved her as being such a favorite with you all. . . . One word before I close, as to the paper which was the unhappy cause of this terrible blow. It contained, as I had feared, the long-dreaded intelligence of Sir Edward's fatal quarrel with Mr. H.; and I send it off by the same post, as you will wish to know the sad particulars. I cannot write more now, for I am fairly worn out, and must take some rest. You know how deeply I sympathise with you. . . .

"Most affectionately yours,

"Helen Ward."

5. Extract from the "Morning Herald," of 12th November, 1832.

"Fatal Duel at Dieppe.—We learn from the Paris papers that an extraordinary and fatal duel took place some days since in the neighborhood of Dieppe, between two Englishmen, neither of whom have as yet been identified. It appears that the parties encountered each other in the court-yard of the Hotel de l'Europe, where one of them, whose linen bears the mark of C. G. H., had been staying for some days. The new comer at once assailed the other evidently with the most opprobrious language, to which Mr. H. replied with equal warmth, but the conversation being carried on in English, was unfortunately not understood by any one present. The altercation at length grew so warm that the landlord was compelled to interfere, and the parties then left the hotel together. A few hours afterwards Mr. H. returned, and calling for his bill, hastily packed his portmanteau, and departed. He has since been traced to Paris, where he was lost sight of altogether. Early the next morning a rumor spread that the body of an Englishman had been found in a vineyard, about a mile distant from the town, and on enquiry it proved that the victim was no other than the gentleman with whom the dispute occurred on the previous night. It was evident on examination that the unfortunate man must have fallen in a fair fight, though no seconds appear to have been present during the encounter. A pistol, recently discharged, was firmly grasped in the hand of the dead man; and at a dozen paces distant lay its fellow, evidently the weapon with which he had been killed. The fatal wound, too, was exactly in that portion of the chest which would be exposed to an adversary's fire, and had evidently pierced the heart, so that death must have been instantaneous. The weapons, too, with which the fatal duel was fought appear to have been the property of the deceased. They were a very handsome pair of duelling pistols, hair triggers, and evidently of English make. On the butt of each was a small silver shield, bearing the initials 'E. B.,' and an armed hand grasping a crossbow. The initials of the unfortunate gentleman's opponent were, as we have said, C. G. H.; and we have reason to fear that the victim was a young baronet, of considerable landed property, with whose sudden departure for the Continent rumor has for some time past been busy.

"Since our first edition went to press, we have received further particulars, which leave no room for doubt that the victim of the above fatal occurrence was, as we feared, Sir Edward Boleton, Bart., of Beechwood, Kent; but the cause of the duel, and the name of his opponent, still remain a mystery. The unfortunate gentleman leaves behind him a young wife, to whom he was united but a few months since. Failing a male heir, the baronetcy will now, we understand, become extinct, while the bulk of the estates will pass to a distant connection. The widow, however, is, we believe, in possession of a considerable independent property."

"You ask me whether I am satisfied with what I saw the other day of poor Gertrude Boleton's little ones. To say that I am satisfied with their appearance would, poor little things, be hardly true, for they are still anything but healthy—poor Gertie especially looking like a faded lily. The younger, however, is certainly improved, and will, I hope, do well, and I quite think that they both are better where they are than they could possibly be elsewhere. It is indeed sad, poor things, that they should have no near relation with whom they could live, but I quite agree with you that, in your state of health, it would not only be too great an undertaking for yourself, but would be by no means beneficial to them. Indeed I am convinced that on every account they are best where they are. The air of Hastings seems to suit them, and in the higher part of the town where Mrs. Taylor lives is bracing without being too cold. Mrs. Taylor herself is a most excellent person, and extremely fond of them. She seems especially interested in poor Gertie, and never wearies of relating instances of the wonderful sympathy between the twins. This sympathy seems even more physical than mental According to Mrs. Taylor, every little ailment that affects the one is immediately felt also by the other, though with this difference, that your namesake, Katie, is but very slightly affected by Gertie's troubles, while she, poor child, I suppose from the greater delicacy of her constitution, is rendered seriously ill by every little indisposition of her sister. I have often heard of the strong physical sympathies between twins, but never met myself with so marked an instance. Both, unfortunately, are sadly nervous, though here, too, the elder is the greatest sufferer, while in the younger it seems to take the form of extreme quickness of perception. . . . Of course, as they grow up, they should be placed with some one in our own rank of life, but for the present I think poor Mrs. Taylor will do very well. . . . I shall be at Hastings again next month, and will write when I have seen them. . . .

"Affectionately yours,

"Helen Ward."

"Marine Hotel, Hastings,
"12th July, 1837.

"Dear Miss B—Helen was unfortunately prevented from leaving home at the time your letter arrived, so, as the matter seemed urgent, I thought it best to come myself. I am sorry to have to send you such very unsatisfactory intelligence. Poor little Catherine has been lost—stolen, I am afraid, by gipsies—and I have hitherto been quite unable to find any clue to their whereabouts. It appears that Mrs. Taylor took them for a trip with some friends of hers to Fairlie Down, where they fell in with a gang of gipsies, of whom, however, they did not take any particular notice. They had taken their dinner with them, and after finishing it sat talking for some time, when suddenly the child was missed; and, though they hunted in every direction for several hours, no trace of her could be found. On returning to the place where the gipsies had been seen, the camp was found broken up, and the track, after passing near where they had been sitting, was lost on the hard road. Unfortunately, poor Mrs. Taylor—who seems quite distracted by what has happened—could think of nothing at first but writing to you, and it was only by the gossip of her friends, who live at some distance from the town, that the intelligence at length reached the police. Enquiries were being set on foot when I arrived last night, but I fear that, from the time that has been lost, there is now but little chance of recovering the poor child. I have advertised in all directions, and offered a large reward, but I have little hope of the result, nor are the police more sanguine than myself. Unfortunately, poor Catherine's dark, gipsey-like complexion, and black eyes and hair, will render it easy to disguise her features, while her quick intelligence and lithe, active figure, will make her only too valuable an acquisition to the band. I need not tell you how grieved I am at this fresh trouble to these poor children, and I fear Gertrude will suffer severely from the loss of her sister, with whom she has, as you know, so extraordinary a bond of sympathy. I am going now to the police station to consult on further measures, and will write to you again by to-morrow evening's post.

"Ever, dear Miss B,
"Very truly yours,
"Henry Ward."

"Grove Hill House Academy, Hampstead House,
"Wednesday, May 1st, 1842.

"Madam.—I have much pleasure in complying with your request for a monthly report of the health and progress of my very interesting young friend and pupil, Miss Boleton. In a moral and educational point of view nothing could possibly be more satisfactory. . . . . Of my dear young friend's health I am compelled, however, to lament my inability to address you in the same congratulatory terms which in all other matters I am happily so well authorized to employ. Notwithstanding the extreme salubrity of the atmosphere by which in this justly celebrated locality she is surrounded, and I trust I may venture to add the unremitting attention she has experienced both at my own hands and those of my medical and educational assistants, her general health is still, I regret to say, very far from having attained to that condition of entire convalescence at which I trust she may yet, with the advantage of a prolonged residence upon the Heath, before very long arrive. My medical adviser, Dr. Winstanley—a physician of European reputation, and one in whom I can repose the most entire confidence—informs me that Miss Boleton is suffering from no especial ailment, though subject from time to time to fits of illness to which it is often difficult to assign any sufficient cause, and which after a while disappear as strangely as they arose. He trusts with me that the pure air of the Heath, which so far as we can venture to believe has already been beneficial to his interesting patient, will in course of time effect a radical cure. The loss of her young sister, of which you informed me on her first joining our little society, inflicted beyond doubt a very serious blow upon her naturally feeble constitution; but I trust that its effects are already passing away. I shall, of course, adhere strictly to your instructions never in any way to allude to the sad occurrence in conversation with Miss Boleton, and have thought it advisable not to acquaint her companions with the fact. On the 1st of next month I shall again do myself the honor of acquainting you with the progress made by my interesting young friend, and have little doubt of being at that time able to furnish you with a satisfactory account of her physical no less than of her moral and intellectual advancement. For the present, dear madam, permit to subscribe myself,

"Your very faithful and obliged servant,
"Amelia Dorothea Vansittart.

Mrs. Ward to the Honorable C. B.

"14th June, 1851.

"My dear Catherine.—Very many thanks for your early intelligence of dear Gertrude's engagement. I congratulate you most heartily, though, as you have yourself alluded to it, I cannot deny that I should have been better pleased had Mr. Anderton, in addition to all his other good qualities, possessed that of a somewhat less nervous and excitable temperament. I have always liked him much; but with poor Gertrude's own delicate constitution I cannot but fear the results of such an union upon both. However, it is impossible to have everything, and in all other respects he seems unexceptionable, so once more I congratulate you heartily. Are you really thinking of coming up to the Exhibition? . . . . Give my best love to dear Gertrude, and say all that is kind and proper for us to her fiancé. Ever, dear Catherine,

"Affectionately yours, "Helen Ward."

Newspapers in America.—The Athenæum, criticising a new book on America, by Dr. Nichols, says:

His account of the New York press is fair and impartial beyond anything that we could have expected from a sometime assistant of the notorious Bennett. Unconsciously perhaps, but candidly, he confirms everything previously known or reported regarding the character of the New York Herald and the principles of its founder and chief editor; he does justice to Mr. Greeley and the Tribune, as well as to the abler and more moderate Times; and we doubt whether any political writer in this country would give a more impartial estimate of the merits and influence of our own leading journals. He produces, moreover, some curious statistics connected with American journalism. Most of our readers are aware that America has a vast multitude of journals; but it is astonishing to learn that their number in 1861 was 4,500, whereof one-tenth were dailies; there being about 50 daily newspapers in the United Kingdom to 450 in the States. The State of New York, with a population of 4,000,000, has 72 dailies; Illinois, with 1,700,000, has 28, and even California has 17. Nor is the South behind hand. South Carolina, with not 300,000 whites, has 60 papers, Louisiana 117, and Georgia 91. Of course the circulation is small, and the price being also low, the profit must be small, and the remuneration of writers very trifling. In fact, the attraction of political literature to American aspirants is not that it offers immediate emolument, but that it is one of the surest roads to office and public influence.

Marie Antoinette's Shoe.—A French journal gives the following account of Marie Antoinette's shoe, now preserved in the Museum of Sovereigns at the Louvre. On the 16th of October, 1793, when Sanson descended from the scaffold after executing the unfortunate Queen, he saw one of the soldiers on duty endeavoring to arrest two boys who had concealed themselves under the guillotine during the execution. One of them had dipped a handkerchief in the royal blood, and the other held a shoe which had fallen from the platform. The boy with the handkerchief was taken, and was only saved from the guillotine by his tender age. The other boy got off with the shoe, which he and his son kept as a relic till 1859, when the latter carried it in a velvet bag to Count Horace de Viel Castel, conservator of the Museum of Sovereigns, by whom, of course, it was gladly accepted. The shoe is small, considering that she was a tall woman.

Modern Chivalry.—It has often struck me that now-a-days women are more "protected" by chivalric fictions than they need be, and that they sometimes find the compliments that are paid them irksome. I do not wish to say anything churlish, but it really borders upon the burlesquing of gallantry to see a slender gentleman giving his arm to a stout, loud, long lady—across a room. There is positively no danger in walking ten feet along a plane surface, well carpeted, with ridges of sofa and hillocks of ottoman. The fair traveller is far less likely to fall if she is left alone. I do delight in a pretty fiction, but I always feel that the joke is being pushed too far when I see a sweet, but strong and healthy creature, who stands well upon her feet, assiduously helped up a precipitous ascent of terrific stairs, four inches between.—Good Words.

Men mutilate their own bodies seldom; their characters often.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "The Californian," 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1864.

PERSONAL.

AS a general thing it is in excessive bad taste for an editor to trouble his readers with anything relating to a personal controversy; but when the interests of his paper are concerned, perhaps it is pardonable.

The morning subsequent to The Californian's first appearance, a sheet published in this city, called the American Flag, came out and denounced the editor of The Californian as a Copperhead, alleging that he came to this country wearing a Copperhead badge, which he openly paraded in the streets. This charge has since been several times reiterated, accompanied by personalities and diatribes which could have found place in no respectable journal. So far as the Copperhead-badge charge is concerned, the following cards will be sufficiently explanatory:

Office of the Chief of Police,
San Francisco, July 22, 1864.

Soon after Mr. Webb's coming to this city, and while he was connected with the Evening Bulletin, I showed him a copperhead-pin or badge which had fallen into my possession. He requested permission to take it down to the Bulletin office and make an item of it, which I very willingly granted. An item about the pin appeared in the same evening's Bulletin. I have since heard that Mr. Webb, being seen with the badge in his possession after leaving my office, was charged with having worn it out to this country. M. J. Burke.

San Francisco, July 22d, 1864.

As the charge of coming to this country wearing a Copperhead badge is made against Mr. Webb, it is only fair that I explain the basis upon which it rests. While personally unacquainted with Mr. Webb, I met him between the City Hall and the Bulletin office, and saw him exhibiting a Copperhead badge to some friends. Jumping rather hastily at a conclusion, I mentioned in a little paragraph in the Call—the paper with which I was then connected—that the new editor of the Bulletin bore a Copperhead badge through the streets. I should have thought nothing of the matter had I not been previously misinformed, to the effect that Mr. Webb was a Secessionist in principle, a foreigner by birth, and not a citizen of the United States. I subsequently satisfied myself that I had been entirely in the wrong in the matter, that Mr. Webb's loyalty was above the shadow of suspicion, and that I had misconstrued an act of friendly courtesy on his part into an insult to my country and myself. Acting on this conviction, without consultation with any one, I subsequently sought out Mr. Webb and frankly apologised to him for the wrong I had unintentionally done him. I have since stated these facts to parties connected with every respectable journal in this city, and would have made this explanation public before had it seemed worth while. Albert S. Evans.

So much for that story.

The American Flag on Thursday morning contained a paragraph stating that The Californian was owing its printers arrears of pay. The printers of the office insisted on righting hat matter, and have taken steps to do so. They also desire the publication of the following card, as a matter of justico to themselves as well as to the office.

Californian Composition Rooms,
San Francisco, July 21st, 1864.

The charge in the Flag of this morning that the printers in this office are unpaid, are poorly paid, or in any way connected with "rats," is an infamous falsehood. Every man in this office is a member in good standing of the Typographical Union. The rates paid by the office are the highest the rules of the Association demand, and no man has ever had to wait one minute after 3 o'clock on Saturday afternoon of each week for his pay.

P. J. Thomas.
A. M. Kenaday.
John Landy.

What more can be said? To the gross personalities with which we have been assailed there is of course no reply.

Commending as we do this paper to the families and firesides of California, we have sought to exclude from it every idea or expression unfit for the perusal of gentlemen or ladies. We have thought it fit, perhaps unnecessarily, to expose the falsehood of the charges above referred to, but here the controversy stops. It is impossible for us to comment upon or retaliate the foul epithets most familiar to his pen; nor can we, from week to week, abuse the patience of our readers by refuting the slanders which malignity may invent. It cannot surely be requisite to demonstrate anew what the tone of his journal and the manner in which he has conducted a controversy which he himself provoked has already proven—that he is beneath the notice of gentlemen. In this latter respect he enjoys an immunity as unenviable as the notoriety he has achieved—that of editing a sheet in the conduct of which every principle of legitimate journalism is daily outraged, even the suggestions of decency violated. Not content with bestowing vituperation upon the editor of this journal with whom he is totally unacquainted—a fact patent enough by the prevailing tone of his articles—he has disregarded a rule of etiquette which obtains even in bar-rooms, by attempting to drag ladies into the controversy, causing that annoyance and apprehension on their account which a man never feels on his own. This he has done repeatedly; and of all offences against propriety and the unwritten but well-understood laws which govern men of honor, this is the most flagrant and cowardly.

Here the matter rests. In the popular estimate and by his own conduct, the person who has provoked this explanation stands outside even that barbarous code which comes down to us as the fading relic of a foolish feudal age. To refer once more to the direct and specific charges he saw fit to bring against us, Junius in one of his letters says: "My Lord, I will not call you a scoundrel, but by the grace of God I will demonstrate you to be one!" In manner somewhat like, respect for the readers of this journal forbids our characterizing this man by the one English word which befits his conduct; but have we not convicted him of falsehood? If popular report may be believed, does he not stand upon record as an assassin? Does not the immunity which he enjoys in the perpetration of these outrages prove that he is below the notice of gentlemen?

With these remarks we abandon the subject for ever. The estimate which this person professes to place upon us personally, and in a literary point of view, is to be regarded as rather complimentary than otherwise. No one can think of quarrelling with a man on a mere question of taste. In calling us a "blackguard," for instance, he does not prove us one so much as he proves that he does not know what a gentleman is. But in no case can we be induced to continue a controversy where the bandying of epithets is expected to take the place of argument, and where the victory must infallibly turn to the side where foul language predominates, and rest with the one whose vocabulary of vulgar vituperation is most extensive. In such a controversy an exasperated fishwoman would have the advantage of the inventor of language, let alone a moderate logician like ourselves. For this reason we retire from a contest in which we are convinced that we would certainly get the worst of it, however prolonged it might be.

HAVE WE DONE OUR DUTY?

ACCORDING to the Sanitary Commission Bulletin, it is feared that the late Sanitary Fairs held in the East may eventually check the regular flow of charity towards the Commission, and thus counterbalance the immediate and ruinous results of these festivals. Should such be the case, it may be of vital importance to the Commission that California should increase her contributions. No such demand has yet been made upon us; nor do we suppose that the officers who control that noble system of beneficence, from the President down, will ask from California anything more than she is at present doing. But there are certain facts and figures mentioned in the report which provoke the self-inquiry, whether we have done all we could or should do—whether, in spite of our self-complacency, our share in the contribution of two hundred millions of money and material that the loyal States have given in voluntary offerings and charities during the war be anything like our pro rata, to say nothing more.

The prevailing impression among ourselves is, that we have been extremely liberal. We remember that Mr. King, who freely gave his life in his untiring endeavors to bring the loyalty and munificence of the State up to the standard of his own lofty soul, sometimes found it necessary to awaken the flagging interest of his auditors by some deftly-turned compliment to the generosity of Californians. The diversion was always ludicrously effective. Cheers and enthusiasm took the place of former silence and apathy. Nothing could be more impressive than our comfortable self-complacency; nothing more sincere than the frank and enthusiastic way we cheered the recital of our own virtues. No doubt at that moment the whole-souled orator lent himself to a generous illusion, and clothed the offering of California with the larger bounty of his own nature. It was our rare fortune to have a poetical and generous almoner for our bounty. Our apples of gold were set in pictures of silver to the admiring gaze of all.

It is only of late that we have learned what was the magnitude or extent of the demands upon our Eastern brethren at that time, and the promptitude with which they were met. With the withdrawal of a large number of active men from the ranks of labor and the different professions, with an inflated currency and the prices of provisions advancing rapidly, our Eastern brethren have still exhibited a steady munificence which makes our spasmodic efforts seem trifling in comparison. It is only when there is a momentary cessation of these steady supplies, which were mostly of material and actual subsistence, that we get, through the alarm of the Sanitary Commission, an idea of their extent and importance. Otherwise, through their regularity and the systematic channels of the Commission they would have claimed no attention. We are made suddenly aware, through their temporary withdrawal, that for the past two years every loyal family has contributed some little trickling stream to this organized public fountain of charity, besides the personal and private offerings to local regiments, companies, and brothers, fathers and husbands in the ranks; and that with all our unrestricted resources and immunities from the evils of war, we are falling far behind the poorest State of our loyal Eastern brotherhood.

Facts like these are calculated to provoke reflection in every loyal breast. As we said before, it is not probable that the U. S. Sanitary Commission will ask for an increase of charity from California. But if the war continues, it will be well to be in readiness to meet if not anticipate the demand as a simple act of duty.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

OUR latest Eastern exchanges, received overland, are under date of the 27th ult., at which time the New York papers were discussing, with much spirit, the financial operations of Mr. Secretary Chase, just before his retirement from the Treasury Department. $40,000,000 of the $75,000,000 6-per-cent. loan of 1881 had been awarded by him at 104 and upwards, all lower bids being rejected. After tho awards had been made, the loan was selling at about 106; but much difficulty had been experienced in arranging for the payment of the several installments due thereon. It was contended that if Mr. Chase had adhered to his original policy of offering the entire loan to the highest bidder, and at the same time had faithfully persevered in a contraction of the currency, the unwise legislation in relation to Gold and Sterling Exchange, and the partial derangement of every other financial interest, would not have followed so quickly.

Nearly one-half the proposals for this loan were declined, and a certain price was fixed with a view to float it at that standard, under the tide of fresh issues of paper money. The Gold bill, since then, has been repealed, owing probably to some little fear that certain sections were in conflict with the law regulating the payment of interest on the public debt in gold. The last clause of the first section of this bill read as follows: "And it shall be unlawful to make any loan of money or currency, not being in coin, to be repaid in coin or bullion." It was maintained by some parties that any individual who might take any portion of the Government loan, paying the Treasury in currency, and agreeing to receive ultimate payment in return in gold, would violate the law, and subject himself to fine and imprisonment. It therefore became a serious question whether the Secretary of the Treasury could make, in future, any loans under the Acts of Congress, receivable in currency and payable in gold. Because of this and many other difficulties that were ensuing, Congress speedily repealed the odious law, as we were informed by telegraph two weeks since. We are yet without any definite information of the causes that led to the resignation of Mr. Chase at so critical a juncture in the fiscal affairs of the Government. Wall street holders of a portion of the $40,000,000 loan, alluded to above, were allowed to pay up their second installment in 6 per cent. certificates of deposit, which facilitated operations somewhat during a temporary scarcity of legal tender notes, growing out of the sudden demand for so large an amount of currency. The Clearing House Banks had not been in accord in reference to settlements on this basis, in lieu of greenbacks; and the Dissenting Creditor Banks were refusing to take their balances in certificates. It is quite apparent that financial affairs in the East are daily becoming more complicated, and that no favorable change is likely to take place unless a large portion of the volume of currency now afloat is absorbed in some way, and no further issues of paper money are made.

Legal Tender notes in this market have rallied a little during the week under the influence of a brisk demand from Nevada Territory, advancing from 39¼ to 41@41¼. The prevailing stagnation incident to all business in Virginia City, and the heavy losses that have been met with lately, have, it is said, duced a few parties there to cancel their liabilities to their creditors in greenbacks in lieu of gold.

The Mining share market continues exceedingly depressed, and very light transactions have been made during the week. An entire lack of confidence in the intrinsic value of most stocks seems to pervade all classes. Speculation has ceased and few or no orders are executed by the Brokers for investment.

Gould and Curry opened on Monday at $1,700, then steadily declined to $1.490, rallied yesterday morning to $1,525, and closed in the afternoon at $1,570. The next monthly dividend of $50, is, it is said, already in Bank at the credit of the Company. No new developments are reported this week.

Ophir has been in less favor, and fell from $700 to $600 asked, and was offered at the close at $525.

Potosi has been active and well sustained, advancing from $950 to $1,050 receding to $975, seller's option, 45 days, and selling yesterday at $1,000. Some 30 feet were sold within this range. Intelligence of a favorable character has been received from the mine the past few days.

Savage is held with firmness at about $1,100, at which rates sales were made. Shipments of bullion from this mine continue large.

Burning Moscow fell from $15 to $11. Lady Bryan declined from $7¼ to $2¼, rallied to $3¼, and closed at $3. Golden Age and Empire also declined from $20 to $17¼.

North American has been in less favor and steadily declined from $70 to $44.

Nevada (J. G.) was sold at $22. Baltic at $25. Bullion at $50. Baltimore American at $33, and Live Oak Copper at $22.

North Potosi rose from $65 to $69 and then fell to $60. Sales were made yesterday at $58.

Periodicals Received.—William E. Loomis, who succeeds to the business of Mr. Ullman, on the corner of Sansome and Washington streets, sends us the Continental and Knickerbocker Magazines, the Round Table, Frank Leslie's Illustrated, New York and Boston papers, and a copy of Cousin Phillis—Miss Thackeray's novel.

Photograph of Gen. Grant.—An excellent picture of General Grant, photographed by Bradley & Rulofson, and published by J. C. Goodhue & Co., is before us. The General's teeth are firmly set, and his look is that of a man who, if he has not taken Richmond yet, is determined to before he abandons his task.

THE SEPARATION OF THE SEXES IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

SCHOOLS for boys and girls, after the age of ten years, should be separate in large cities. In small towns the children are so few and their homes so far apart, that schools of proper size can only be organized by allowing both sexes to attend the same school. A serious error has been committed in San Francisco by maintaining the mixed public schools; but there is hope now for a change. The Board of Education have appointed a special committee to consider the advisability of separating the sexes. Some of the committeemen are in favor of a change, but we fear that they are not a majority, or that they will apply the new rule to only one or two schools. There are many reasons why the sexes should be separated, and we shall mention a few of them:

The public schools are supported by taxes levied on all the taxable property, and paid by all the people. As everybody pays, so everybody should be permitted to use the schools. But many parents are determined that their large girls shall not go to a school where they are in the same room with large boys, and, as a consequence, these girls do not attend the public schools, but remain at home or go to Catholic or private schools. The dislike of mixed schools is not unwise and even if it were, the prejudices of the community should be respected. They pay their money, and their wishes ought to be taken into consideration.

When the girls are kept away from the public schools, either their education is neglected, or their parents are put to a great expense for tuition in private schools—both serious evils.

The efficiency and value of the public schools increase with their size. They ought to collect all the children of the country; and not until they do so will they be properly supported and managed.

Private schools are now maintained chiefly because the public schools are not so good as they should be, and the chief objection is the mixing of the sexes. But private schools should be discouraged. They divide the children into castes and classes, and maintain the prejudices of creed, birth, occupation and wealth. The public school breaks down the barriers of sect, the distinctions of clique, the differences of nativity, the influence of superstition, and all the factitious and pernicious divisions in the community. The public schools are now superior to any private school in many points, but they should be made superior in every respect, and they never can be made superior until the sexes are divided.

In a large city many of the boys must be bad. Prudent mothers are wise in determining that their large daughters shall not be thrown into company with such boys every day. Acquaintance and friendship must result in many cases, even though the two sexes never speak in the school-room.

Among the great multitude of girls who attend the public schools, cases of scandal must occur occasionally, and the blame is often thrown on the school, because the offender is known to be in attendance there, though the school is in no way responsible for the evil.

A great many other considerations might be stated, but these are sufficient for the present. It may be well to state, however, that the Police Court was yesterday occupied with closed doors in investigating one of the most painful developments, in which a number of girls belonging to the public schools are concerned, that has yet occurred in this community. Were the facts to be made public, few even of those who are at present opposed to the reform would question that the separation of the sexes in the public schools is an imperative necessity and not simply a question of taste.

MORAL FORCE—AN ILLUSTRATION.

THE day was calm, unusually so—a calm day is as noticeable in San Francisco as a fine day in England. The bay reposed in peaceful sleep, land-locked in its smiling hills. The city smoked and fumed below my elevated and airy domicile. The rise and fall of fortunes or empires for the moment were forgotten. I was sitting serenely under the shade of a tea tree, surrounded by an attentive circle of children, engaged in the solution of an interesting moral problem. Our family circle had lately received an accession, a starved, lean and hungry kitten—not prepossessing in appearance—of that yellow cast which, whether in man or beast, is not a passport to general favor. Our dog Boss, a black and tan terrier of highly respectable appearance, was engaged in prospecting the new comer. A bone had been placed before the hungry starveling. It looked nice—Boss wanted it. He had just returned from a health-promoting ramble. At the smallest demonstration, a furious spit drove him back several paces. He advanced again and again, but with the same result. What had this creature to back it? Boss could have throttled it at one swallow. He was a trained rat-catcher. The creature did not go upon its muscle but upon its spunk. Yes, that was it. Spunk—grit, indomitable resolution, will, energy, if you please—the sole term by which this little frail, miserable creature held on to its dinner or its place in the universe.

"Children," said I, "here is a lesson for you. Behold this kitten! It is poor, it is lean, it is hungry, it is forlorn—but it holds on to its own. You have all been told to be good children, and mind what is said to you. That is well. You have often—all or some of you—been whipped for not minding what some exceedingly unreasonable person has said to you. You have exercised your immature brains to know what it was really right to do. You have all tried to be good at times, and been sorry for being bad; though in what badness consisted you could not very well tell, even if you were asked. Now, I say to you, look at that kitten: hold on to your own, my juvenile friends; maintain your own place, for nobody will maintain it for you; do not crowd your neighbors, but do not allow yourselves to be crowded. Be not dismayed by great and seemingly overwhelming odds, but give a little spit or a hiss and go to work again. Because we are small and weaker, shall we not live? Yes, and indeed nine lives will we live, if it should be necessary."

I think I produced a favorable effect. The attention of my listeners was about equally divided between myself and the kitten. "Sieze her, Boss!" said Tom—a roguish, black-eyed rascal; but Boss wagged his tail. "That's right, Boss!" said I; "come, now, you shall have your dinner." E. D. W.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE new season of English opera at the Academy of Music was commenced with The Bohemian Girl, on Saturday night, and each repetition since then has uniformly filled the benches. Such popular airs as "I dreamt that I dwelt in Marble Halls, "Come with the Gypsy Bride," and "Then You'll Remember Me"—melodies that have grown old between the well-thumbed pages of music-books without losing their freshness and beauty, and have survived the steady thrumming of solfeggio misses—drew a large number who are not habitual opera-goers, as well as the critics who admire Balfe's originality. The opera was well put upon the stage, and well dressed, with fewer mistakes than usually attend the reproduction of an old favorite where most performers are apt to trust to their memory of former representations.

The singing was exceedingly good—much better than the acting. With but two exceptions—"Arline," (Miss Richings,) and "Devilshoof" (Mr. Peakes)—there was a prevailing deadly-liveliness in the most exciting passages on the first night of its performance, with a little improvement on subsequent nights. The loss of the child of "Count Arnheim," (Mr. Seguin,) was accepted with such manly resignation by that gentleman, that the chorus, as disinterested parties, might have been pardoned for the lack of sympathy they manifested, but not for the absence of most qualities which attend the phenomena of existence. This might have been owing to the ludicrous effect of the prayer, which spite of its excellent music is somewhat ridiculous at that crisis, and is sometimes omitted. Vocally, however, they did much better, and all the choruses and concerted pieces were given with spirit and animation.

Miss Richings' "Arline" was excellently sung and acted. The cultivation and control of her flexible voice was shown to good advantage in some passages that required very rapid and artistic execution. She was dressed with rare good taste, and made a vivacious, coquettish and charming gypsy. "Thaddeus," (Mr. Hill,) the new tenor, seemed to lack confidence and power, although his voice had much sweetness and an excellent style of expression. The same difficulty seemed to attend the efforts of "Count Arnheim," who, though evidently a cultivated artist, labored too much in his solos. Perhaps the wonderful purity of Mr. Peakes' voice threw these deficiencies of his fellow-singers into greater relief—he possessing a most remarkable bass organ, the finest though not the most cultivated that has ever been heard on this coast. In the quartette—"Through the Valleys and Hills"—it was as a thread of pure gold, and the quartette was deservedly encored. Such a voice is worthy of the highest cultivation.

The matinée on Wednesday afternoon passed off very well, although the performers could not but be discouraged by the slim attendance. The gem of the first part was Miss Richings' "Sicilienne," from Verdi's Sicilian Vespers, and she was deservedly encored. Her trills in this song are wonderful. Her Scotch ballads, although very beautiful in themselves, are given in quite too operatic a manner, and lose all their sweetness in roulades and flourishes. Julien was, as usual, excellent, in both his fantasie from Linda and "La Marracca," and his performance alone deserved a better house. The new baritone sang the "Largo al factotum," from Il Barbiere, with a good deal of spirit, and was much better than in the opera of The Bohemian Girl. Hill sang the beautiful song, by Wrighter, "Her bright smile haunts me still," with great sweetness but little force. His voice is exceedingly sweet, and suits well the ballad style. His duet with the basso, (Mr. Peakes,) "The Larboard Watch," was a splendid song and very well given. This same basso has by far the best male voice, and is withal an excellent actor. His song, "The Old Sexton," gave him an excellent opportunity of showing the compass of his splendid voice. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Evans, got on very well in the overture to The Enchantress, but made a miserable failure in the overture to Satanella, breaking down in the commencement of the gem of the whole, "The power of love." As for the "Polka," at the last, no one staid to hear that—the last attempt in the overture to Satanella having satisfied every one as to the orchestra. This afternoon Julien gives his seventh matinée.

On Thursday evening The Child of the Regiment was given to a very full house. There was a vast improvement in both acting and singing. "Cartouche," (the "Sulpice" of La Fille du Regiment,) was rendered by Mr. Seguin with much animation, although this gentleman's voice, spite its education, has not yet given any evidence of more than average quality or melody. Mr. Hill, as "Toneo," kindled a little in his duets with "Marie." (Miss Richings,) and betrayed more power than many of his auditors thought him capable of. When he is acclimated, and entirely recovered from the damaging effects of a sea voyage, he will probably do better. Mr. Peakes ("Corporal Lenoir") did not have much opportunity to display what "Toneo" calls his "gentle voice;" yet the little he did was well done. Miss Richings' "Marie" was a capital blending of naiveté and enthusiasm, dash and tenderness. She was in admirable voice, although in what is evidently her popular charm—i. e., the "trill"—she was not evenly good. We are sorry to see that the young lady sometimes defers to the popular taste rather than her own more correct instincts, by a too frequent introduction of the trill—often misplaced and not always just. She was well dressed in both acts, and looked equally well as a fine lady or a vivandiere; but we have before remarked the uniform excellence of Miss Richings' toilette. Richings pere made a decided hit in the buffo role of "Hortensio." His drunkenness belonged to the Burton order of excellence, and his mastery of some heavy stage business was wonderful in one of his advanced years. The gem of the evening was "The Music Lesson," in which Miss Richings, Mr. Seguin and Miss Kate Martin won deserved applause. Throughout this piece Miss Richings, in voice and dramatic conception, manifested an excellence beyond any of her previous performances. This evening, the last representation of The Daughter of the Regiment will be given, and to-morrow evening The Bohemian Girl.

Miss Jennie Kempton, a popular contralto, arrived on the last steamer, and will soon appear in Linda di Chamounix.

Maguire's Opera House has not been doing the business during the week that the excellent acting of Mr. Wheatleigh would warrant. Paul's Return and The American Cousin have filled the bills. The former piece did not draw so well as to authorize the expectation that Paul will soon be returned to Maguire's stage. In The American Cousin the part of "Asa Trenchard" was well rendered by Mr. Wheatleigh, but he had to encounter a disadvantage, which is evident when we remark that nearly all the audience had seen Joe Jefferson in that character. Mr. Wheatleigh's interpretation of "Asa Trenchard" is correct and quiet, but it lacks the breadth and depth of humor which Jefferson manages to throw into a character that he has made peculiarly his own. Mrs. Edwin made an attractive and pretty "Florence;" while Mrs. Perry, as "Mary Meredith," looked and acted the frank, fair goddess of the milk-pan-and-pail to a charm. Frank Mayo's "Lord Dundreary" was very creditable, though, of course, merely an imitation of that of Sothern, who created the character, and has made it the study of his life. Pope, as "Abel Murcott," gave the usual rendition, but we much wish that a more exalted idea of the habits of the unfortunate clerk might become impressed upon the theatrical mind. Because "Abel" was addicted to gin is scarcely a reason that he should so far go back on water as to perambulate parlors with the look of a man who does not wash his face quite so often in the month as Sunday comes. Barry played Barry capitally. The only objection that can be brought against his performance of the character is that, according to the spirit of the piece, he should have played "Binney."

The little drama of The Débutante was produced on Wednesday evening as a sort of cap-sheaf to The American Cousin. This is one of the most charming little comedies known on the stage, and Wheatleigh is inimitable in it. As the old Frenchman, "Achille Talma Dufard," he challenges laughter until only aching sides and painfully distended mouths can take up the gauntlet. It is something to see him come down into the orchestra with his "enfant," "Emilié Antoinette Rose," (Lulu Sweet,) and hold converse with the Leader, and beat upon his huge drum. The great fun of the piece turns upon the glimpse it gives of life behind the scenes, and this is so true to the reality that occasionally the actors almost forget themselves in the mimic rehearsal, and indulge in the unconstraint which characterizes them on such occasions. Probably most of our readers are familiar with the plan of the play, but for the benefit of the few who possibly are not, we will briefly sketch it: The old Frenchman is bent on getting a theatrical engagement for his "child," and in his endeavors to secure one displays a most amusing pertinacity. Finally, a row occurs at the rehearsal, with the leading lady, and here is an opening for "Emilié Antoinette Rose." There is a plot and a counterplot as to permitting her to appear in the piece, but she finally does appear and makes a remarkable success. The piece itself is a capital one, and all the actors in it play their respective parts with spirit. Last evening witnessed the production of The Marble Heart.

This afternoon and evening John Brougham's spectacular sensation drama Bel Demonio is to be produced. Huge streamers and the largest and most extraordinary woodcuts ever seen in this country have already acquainted the public with this fact. According to the illustrations which adorn every dead-wall in the vicinity, a man is to precipitate himself from rocks several hundred feet high into a channel whose depth no plummet can solve; women are to view the act with all manners of expressions depicted upon the most impossible feminine countenances, and altogether such an entertainment is promised as was never before witnessed in the country. The drama is to be produced, withal, with new scenery, costumes, and furniture, and the most original and surprising musical and mechanical effects. We await the Beautiful Demon with impatience.

IN PURSUIT.

"NOW, Briggs," said the inspector, slowly rattling the silver in his pocket, as he always did when he was thoughtful, "there can't be a doubt of it. The Mr. Styles that embarked on board the Royal Canadian last Monday was Montgomery Hood; the Frenchman with the eye-glass and who went to New York by the Cunard boat, under the name of Monsieur Leroy, was William Hood—a deep card that!" And the inspector softly chinked his half-crowns together and frowned at the empty fire-place at the Liverpool inn parlor—where we sat over our negus.

I—Sergeant John Briggs, of the detective—was of the same way of thinking as my superior in the force, and not without good reason. Our birds had taken wing from British ground; of that we were pretty sure, for it was not the first time by many that we had paid a visit, professionally, to Liverpool. Indeed, the towns that a detective, who is worth his salt, knows the most of, are Liverpool and London, and there were few ins and outs of the great seaport with which we are not familiar. It was next door to an impossibility that the two absconding clerks whom it was our duty to apprehend should be concealed in any part of Liverpool. The police know every hole and corner of that city, big as it is, as well as a stoat knows the burrows in a rabbit warren, and there were plenty of queer customers who would have given us the "office," in case any outsiders had been hiding among their haunts. The description we had received tallied fairly with the appearance of the persons who had sailed in the packets referred to, and we had traced them, step by step, to the water's edge.

And now to explain. The runaways—brothers, as might be guessed from their names—had never been suspected of dishonesty before the crash came. They were respectably connected, the Hoods, and had received a first-rate education. They were both in the employment of a great house in the wholesale export trade, Penderford & Hatch, of Lothbury, E. C.; the elder of the two, William Hood, being cashier, and having the full confidence of his employers. To do the rogue justice, he seems for years to have served the firm faithfully, and it was not until he got deeply involved—being of extravagant habits and a sporting turn—that he commenced his peculations. In his position, and with his abilities, the slippery downward path was only too easy. He falsified accounts, tampered with pass-books and embezzled balances. It was the old story of blind trust and betrayal. At last, when detection was at hand, William Hood fled, carrying with him nearly seven thousand pounds, and a mass of bonds and valuable papers; and his brother—his junior by eleven years, and who had been a tool in the hands of his artful relative—was the companion of his flight.

Even the angry merchants, justly incensed against their treacherous cashier, were sorry for the fate of this poor boy, not yet 18 years of age and absolutely under the influence of his elder brother. It was said, that though clever and apt at learning, the younger Hood was timid and ductile, and much in awe of his senior, whose character was fierce and resolute as well as prompt in stratagem and expedient. Sentiment apart, it was our duty to secure William and Montgomery Hood, and the cash and papers of which they were the unlawful possessors, with the least possible delay. And it had been distinctly intimated to us from our chiefs in Scotland Yard, that immediate reward and probable promotion would be the meed of success.

It was agreed that Inspector Wilkins and I, instead of hunting in couples, as heretofore, should separate, each of us attaching himself to the trace of one of the fugitives. And to my surprise, the inspector, who had a right as my superior officer to take his choice, elected to follow young Montgomery Hood who had sailed in the Quebec packet. Such a chance, to my mind, was almost too good to be true. Wilkins and I had done a good many strokes of work together—neat things, like the gold bars business at Birmingham, or the jewel business at Paddington, which had found their way into the leading newspapers. But somehow it had always been "Mr. Inspector Wilkins and Sergeant Briggs," and I had felt quite snuffed out and eclipsed, even in print, by my friend. In the police courts it was the same—Wilkins! always Wilkins! The magistrates were constantly asking the opinion or tasking the memory of my comrade, who was a living biography of convicts and doubtful persons; and if ever a reporter spoke of "that able officer, Sergeant Briggs," it was sure to be in a corner of the paragraph that nobody cared to study.

And now this very inspector, as jealous of fame and credit (though a good fellow every inch of him) as any member of the force, had voluntarily given up to me what seemed the very cream of the business. William Hood was the principal culprit; William Hood had gone to New York; most likely the chief part of the booty was in his possesion; and most certainly the credit of capturing him—the bolting cashier—would far outweigh the poor renown of running to earth such a half-fledged offender as his boy brother, fifteenth clerk, or something of the sort, in the counting house of Penderford & Hatch. I managed not to show any signs of my exultation, but when I saw Inspector Wilkins fairly under steam down the Mersey, bound for Quebec, I could not help chuckling as I exclaimed, "John Briggs, my boy, your fortune's made."

I took my passage in the Borussia, bound for New York, not exactly as Sergeant Briggs the detective, but as Phipps Gregson, a Birmingham man, travelling in the hardware line for Pash and Bartnett, of Rosemary Lane, Sheffield. Bless you, I was born and bred in the Black country; knew Birmingham and Wolverhampton well as a boy; and could talk "Brummagem," as the commercials call it, as well as any bagman of them all. So, although there were two or three real Simon Pures on board—men who were going out in the cutlery interest, or the castings interest—it never came into their heads to suspect that the firm for which Mr. Gregson really travelled was located in Scotland Yard. Of course, to deceive these honest English commercials was not worth while, were it not that through them I check-mated the prying eyes and glib tongues of our inquisitive Yankee fellow-passengers. And this was essential. If a British detective had been soft enough to let the saloon passengers worm out his character and errand the whole affair would have been blazing abroad in the Herald and the Tribune twelve hours after our landing, and the thief would have learned that one of Queen Victoria's sleuth hounds was upon his track.

Still, as I weighed the matter over—and on the voyage, being a good sailor, (by constitution, I suppose, for my longest voyage had hitherto been to Rotterdam or Belfast, in chase of a runaway,) I had plenty of time for thought—as I turned the matter over, I felt that I must be very cautious and cool. The golden opportunity, thanks to the inspector's unaccountable conduct, I had; but to improve it was not so easy. We detectives—I still consider myself as one of the body to which I so long belonged—we detectives know very well that most rogues are fools as well as knaves; but when we find a rogue who is not a fool, we expect tough work, and I knew that William Hood was not one to be easily caught napping. To pit my wits against his was, I felt, to play an even game. I was practiced in my professional avocations, was an honest man, and should be backed by the law. Great advantages these! I did not undervalue them. But then he had the start, and in some cases the start is nine points in the game.

"Where away is it I'll rowl yer honor?" asked the Irish jarvey who drove the car or fly I had selected from the display of bad and dear hackney carriages on New York quay, and who had evidently not been long enough in America to learn practical republicanism. "Will I dhrive ye to the Metropolitan, sir?"

I chose, however, a different and much less luxurious establishment, Crockett's House, Fourth of July street, in the Bowery—a queer hotel, frequented by rough and ready customers, chiefly from Texas, California, Missouri, and other western regions. I felt pretty sure that Mr. Hood was not likely to be found at the great houses, where the best of the European visitors and American provincials are used to herd together, and my chance of picking up information seemed greater if I kept aloof from respectable society.

I did not let grass grow under my feet, but fell to work on the evening of the very day that saw our landing from the Borussia. Many a man would have rested, or indulged his curiosity as to the strange city and nondescript people. But Sergeant Briggs had his promotion to earn, and his good little wife at home, as well as the three children, to think of. I felt my mouth water as I thought of all I could do with that handsome reward offered by Penderford & Hatch—the schooling for Tom and Alfred, the smart new frocks for Louisa, who would then go to Miss Twigg's select academy at Turnham Green, the terms of which were fifty guineas, to say nothing of the towels and silver spoon. And Mrs. B., a dear, sprightly little woman, who had comforted me often and often when I was but a constable at twenty-eight shillings a week, and it was hard to scrub on—she deserved a full share of gratified whims and wishes from that blessed windfall of five hundred pounds—if only I could get it.

With all my eagerness, however, and I did my best, my toil was labor lost. In vain I ransacked the Empire City, which, like most of us in the detective department, I knew fairly by report, and of which I had been furnished with a sort of rough sketch in writing by my brother officer, Sergeant Hemmings. Hemmings, too, had been friendly enough to give me some letters of introduction, sufficient to launch me, not into the best, which would not have suited my purpose, but into the very worst society in New York. Hemmings knew a thing or two against more than one of the British-born settlers there, which the parties in question preferred to keep dark, even in that easy-going place, and they were obliged to be civil to my comrade or any friend of his. And I, too, here and there met somebody of whose antecedents I knew a good deal more than he or she cared to have published to the world, and who was ready in consequence to buy my silence by helping on my search.

But I failed—failed as miserably and utterly as plain policeman X 42 could have done, if Sir Richard had chosen him for delicate work of the kind. In hotel bars and rowdy groceries, in flash billiard-rooms, in low grog-shops, where sailors and wild Irish battered each other till the police came to establish order with their flails, and in taverns where red-shirted Californians played monte and euchre for dollar notes and pinches of gold-dust, I sought in vain. After weeks spent in exploring the town, I was not a bit wiser than at the beginning. At last, and by mere accident, I found a clue. Of course I had not failed, when I hid myself in the troubled waters of low life at New York, to communicate with the police of the city. There is a fellow-feeling among the guardians of public order all the world over, and I am bound to say that the police of New York were very willing to give me every assistance in their power. They could not, however, point out the covert where my game lay concealed. Even Marshal Keyzor, a most experienced officer, whose name was known on our side the Atlantic as well as on his own, could not help me there. One of his men had noticed the Frenchman with the eye-glass and the poodle, when the packet was boarded by the newsboys and detectives, off the Point: but no suspicion attached to the grotesque foreigner, and from the moment of his landing all traces of him was lost. Yet the city marshals were good enough to introduce me to all the railway, steamboat, omnibus, and stage officials, and to insure me attention in my researches. And, indeed, it was from a railway clerk that I got my clue—such as it was: "Cæsar, the black porter, found this in the waiting room; seems to be a feather of your lost bird, sir. Guess he's sloped by our line, anyhow," said the good-natured clerk, as he popped a card into my hand. It was a common visiting card, and on the back of it had been pencilled, roughly, a rude calculation—a sum in the rule of three, as far as I could make it out. But the card was one of William Hood's cards, and I could hardly doubt that he himself had dropped it; and most likely the Yankee clerk was correct in his conjecture. Wilham Hood was most probably absent from New York, and it was reasonable to suppose that he had journeyed by the railway at the terminus of which the tell-tale bit of pasteboard had been found. The line led, firstly, to Albany, and to Albany I went.

I went to Albany, and I went to Rochester, and I went to Buffalo. I did more, for I tried the hotels at Niagara Falls—then very crowded, for it was hot weather, and the polite world was out of town—and I went as far as Sandusky, on a wild-goose chase after a man who was a rogue, I dare say, because he looked so awfully frightened when I began to ask him a few questions professionally, but not my rogue. And then, sick at heart, I turned back to the east, retraced my steps to the Hudson river, and what they call the Highlands—a very fashionable resort of the New Yorkers in summer time; and, after vainly inquiring there, began to feel despair of any success.

I rambled away from the Mountain House, where I had taken up my temporary quarters, and where about five hundred ladies and gentlemen were sojourning, so that the clatter of knives, forks, and tongues, at the grand table d'hote was something to astonish one. But at an American table d'hote it seems you can get up and be off without offending anybody. The Yankees don't scramble over a meal now in ten minutes of grudged time; they have gone into the other extreme, and spin out the better part of the afternoon over their five courses and iced waters, and the long dinner was wearisome to me.

So out I went, and down the steep incline, dell after dell and glen after glen opening upon my eyes with fresh beauty. Beneath me lay the broad Hudson, pure and bright as a silver riband, flecked with sails, and widening out into what the old Dutch settlers called an inland sea—the Tappan Zee. And all about me lay the Nine Pins, the green mountains of the Catskill, solemn and beautiful under the darkening blue sky of a grand American summer's evening. Mountains and river, and sky and woods—for there were some monstrous pines and maples left, here and there, unfelled—made up such a pretty scene, that I gazed and gazed for a long time. Members of the force see more ugly sights than lovely ones, and we are mostly kept in thickly-peopled districts, as is reasonable; so a sweet prospect is a real treat to some of us. And though I had been about a bit in the course of duty, I had never seen such a charming landscape except on the drop-scene of a theatre. Presently I strolled down to the Hudson, hired a pinnace, and went out for a sail. The boatmen were a couple of Dutchmen, father and son, as I soon found out. They were not very talkative, when compared with Americans of Anglo-Saxon descent; but when they heard I was from the old country, and had been to Rotterdam and other Dutch ports, they warmed into conversation. As far as I could make out, they thought themselves half Hollanders still, though it was the old man's great-grandfather who had come out in some ship whose name I couldn't pronounce, and which had brought from Europe some Dutch dignitary whose title and office were unintelligible, but who must have been a great personage in his day, for he not only brought a coach and servants and horses along with him, but bricks from Leyden or Utrecht to build his house. But these slow, cautious boatmen were very good-natured, and pointed me out many notable spots along the river—tho "Buckleap," over which some hunted deer had bounded in the early days of the settlement; the rock where some great Indian chief, warrior, or prophet had been shot with a silver bullet; the site of a ruined farm-house, burned by Cowboys or Skinners in the revolutionary struggle. At last I noticed a person, apparently a gentleman from his gesture and carriage, standing on a point of land and beckoning to us. I bade my boatmen steer inshore, and we were soon within easy speaking distance.

"I beg your pardon, sir, I am sure," said the gentleman who had beckoned to us, taking off his hat with the utmost politeness; "were it not that a lady's comfort is concerned, I would not have ventured to trespass upon you; but the ferryman at the proper station is disabled from crossing. He has been carousing with some boon companions, and has foolishly swallowed a quantity of raw whisky, in compliance with some stupid wager, I understand, and now lies helpless and useless. There are no persons at the ferry-house capable of managing the heavy boat. My wife, who is in delicate health, wishes to reach the Mountain House before the dews fall, and if you would kindly put us across the river, we should be much obliged for the courtesy."

What tongues these Americans have, to be sure! Of course I willingly acceded to the request, and would have done so had the favor been asked by the most awkward John Bull alive; but it was a downright pleasure to oblige such travellers as these. Mr. Sterling—that was the gentleman's name, and, as he said in his frank way, he "hailed" from Virginia—was certainly a very prepossessing young man, and a very fluent and well-informed talker. And Mrs. Sterling—who rose from a mossy hollow beneath the shadow of a rock, where she had been reclining, almost invisible from the river—appeared a richly dressed and elegant young woman, but very timid. She wore her Brussels lace veil down, hot as the sultry day was, and only spoke in a sort of whispering tone; while she seemed to cling trustfully, but rather helplessly, to her husband's arm. It was beautiful to see what attention Mr. Sterling paid her, with what anxious care he watched over her, and how, when we left the boat, he supported her steps up the rocky road with his strong arm.

Afterwards, when the Virginian and I were smoking our cigars in the cool verandah of the Mountain House, and sipping a glass of "Stonewall" to our better acquaintance, Mr. Sterling told me a good deal about his antecedents, as Americans will do. Before long I knew how many negroes he had on his estate, how many acres of tobacco, and how many bins of old wine of his grandfather's importing. I also learned that pretty Mrs. S., quite a bride, was a native of Philadelphia. He asked a few questions, too, in a careless, off-hand way. So I had come by the Cunard boat—which boat, now?—Asia? City of London? Africa? Quick trip? smooth sea? many queer folks among the passengers—English, especially? Had I been in England, and had my companion been an Englishman, I should have thought he was trying to pump me. But the Americans are inquisitive to a proverb, and I thought nothing of Mr. Sterling's curiosity.

The Virginian and his pretty wife were going to the lakes—all this, you must know, happened the year before the civil war began, and while Virginia was still in the Union—and as they were to leave the highlands on the following morning, and I was on the wing, too, it was arranged that we should travel together as far as Buffalo, or even Cincinnati; for I had picked up, while lounging in the bar, certain hints and broken phrases which led me to think that the game I sought would be flushed further to the west. A corn-factor, over his julep, had described an intelligent "Briton" he had met at Buffalo, and who seemed very much like William Hood. A gaunt minister, in homespun coat and deerskin gambadoes, spoke of an English stripling who had "tarried a night" at his manse among the Ohio hog-farms, and who had lost his way and lamed his horse in some excursion from Cincinnati. The account of the lad in question tallied with the description of Montgomery Hood.

We started together, Mr. and Mrs. Sterling and myself. Hot as the day was, Mrs. Sterling wore a white burnous of some thin white stuff, full of silvery stripes, and her white veil down as before. She spoke very little, but what she did say was very gentle and ladylike, but not clever in the least. It was beautiful to see with what affectionate trust she clung to her husband, and relied on him for everything. It was evident that he was the guiding-spirit of the matrimonial firm, and she a mere childish, confiding thing, relying implicitly on his strength and shrewdness. It was a pretty sight, but I could not help feeling a sort of contempt for the silly little woman too. As we alighted from the car in front of the railway station, I stooped to lift a trunk, and my pistol, which I kept in my breast pocket, slipped out and fell with a bang upon the gravel, just at Mrs. Sterling's feet.

The lady screamed. The porter, a negro, broke into a horse-laugh, and Mr. Sterling picked up the weapon, looked at it curiously—it was no revolver, but one of the old double-barrels we get from the Government—and returned it to with a bow and a smile, drily saying:

"You travel, I think you told me, in the interest of some Sheffield house. Am I to consider this, pray, as a specimen of the hardware you deal in, or have you really imbibed the idea that our unfortunate country is so full of blood-thirsty brawlers that fire-arms are thus necessary as bosom friends?"

I could not help wincing. No doubt it was proper that I should be very discreet as to my errand, but I could not appear in a doubtful light to my new friends.

"Sir," said I, "you take me for an impostor, and perhaps a rogue. The first I am obliged to be; the second I am not. To account for my possession and carrying about me of this unlucky pistol, I'll tell you who I am. I'm Sergeant John Briggs, of the detective force, and I have come from London to arrest two dangerous felons who have absconded with a large sum. If you now like to drop my acquaintance——" Drop my acquaintance! it was a comfort the chivalrous young Virginian did not wring my hand off. He declared that he was pleased and proud to be my fellow-traveller; and even the timid Mrs. Sterling murmured something complimentary, and showed her white teeth in a smile. Very white teeth they were, and not the least spoiled with sugar-plums, sweet cakes, and scalding tea, which ruin the mouths of most American women.

After this we travelled on very agreeably together. And now I really reaped some solid advantage from my intimacy with the bridal pair. I was admitted, as one of their party, to the ladies' car, and was out of reach of tobacco juice, noisy talk, and neighbors who were neither clean nor civil. Republicans as the Yankees are, they have three classes on their lines—the ladies' car, answering to our first, but shut against solitary male passengers; the general cars, where all whites herd together; and the negro car. Under Mrs. Sterling's protection, I was admitted among the aristocrats of the rail, and found the journey much more pleasant. The car was well cushioned, lined with glossy cloth, and nearly empty; and, in that baking weather, the contrast to the stifling atmosphere of the wild-beast vans in which I was usually compelled to travel was delightful.

Pleasant as it might be, the journey was short. At Schenectady, where several lines meet, we came to a dead halt, and a good deal of noise and confusion ensued. The station was crowded; the single sets of rails were choked with engines, cars and trucks, and every one seemed to shout and wrangle at once. Part of the crowd consisted merely of the ordinary pleasure-seekers, bound for Saratoga, Niagara Falls, or other fashionable resorts, and of business men on their way west or east; but the more uproarious element was contributed by a throng of Irish emigrants, whose train it was proposed to shunt on one side, and break up, in favor of the better dressed and better paying natives. But these Hibernian new arrivals, who had, it seems, made some contract for their safe and speedy transport with one of the touting speculators so common in New York, were by no means passive in the matter. They had begun to conceive the idea that they were taken in, and their Celtic blood was on fire.

"If ye stand this, boys, it's skin ye alive they will! Haveu't we been half starved already, let alone sleepin' by the way side, and being packed like bullocks for market?" bawled one excited fellow in a faded blue coat, garnished with metal buttons.

"Who's to say the chatin', deceiviu' crimp tould us a word of thruth at all?" screamed a woman who carried a child in her arms, while two other little ones clung, frightened, to her skirts. "He's pouched our dollars—the curse of Cromwell be on him!—and who'll warrant that laborers are wanted at Oswego, and wages high and mate cheap? See how we're thrated!"

Then began a dreadful uproar. The two or three policemen on the platform were cowed by the display of sticks which took place, every Irishman seeming to possess either a blackthorn or a sapling, and the brandished cudgels and wild cries of the mob struck terror into the more civilized portion of the company. However, several Americans, whose glossy clothes and quiet air of self-possession marked them as belonging to what is there called the "aristocracy," came forward, and with much tact and good-humor proceeded to coax the noisy Paddies into a more pacific mood. But meanwhile the Irishwomen were very violent and clamorous, excitedly rushing up and down the line, and protesting that they and their "childher" would have places in the train, come what might, and threatening to drag the "fine New York gentry" from their seats.

Under these alarming circumstances, it is hardly wonderful if Mrs. Sterling became nervous, and her husband anxious to get her away from Schenectady. At this moment the conductor of the train happened to pass.

"When shall we be starting, sir? Snakes! I can't answer you; no, sir. Some of those Irish loafers have been meddling with the locomotive, and smashed the levers, and lifted the wheels off the line. We must get steam up in the 'Old Hickory,' and that will take time. Better get the lady into the waiting-room, until we've quieted these immigrants a bit."

This was sensible counsel, and it was followed at once. The door was opened; I got out first, and received a good armful of shawls, novels, scent-bottles, and little lady-like trifles of that sort, for Mrs. Sterling traveled with a great deal of light luggage, and her husband had enough to do to carry the rest and to hand her out of the car. While this was going on, I noticed a man, one of the Irish laborers by his dress and figure, who wore a rough frieze coat, hot as the day was, and had his shaggy red hair hanging like a horse's mane over his face. This fellow, standing a little back among his countrymen, was taking no part in the row, but eyeing us in an inquisitive sort of fashion. An ugly, wild-looking customer he was—had been fighting, most likely, for half his face was concealed by a blue cotton handkerchief, from under which peeped strips of plaster, but somehow the other half of the face seemed familiar to me. I thought and thought, rubbed my eyes, and looked again. The fellow was gone! Nothing was to be seen but waving cudgels and outstretched arms, and excited men and women gesticulating, and here and there a glib American soothing the mob, and half-laughingly pointing to a strong body of police, who had just been fetched by special engine from Albany, and who had cutlasses and revolvers to supplement those short, heavy flails which Yankee constables carry when on ordinary duty.

"It is all right now, my love," said Mr. Sterling, calming his wife's timid fears as he assisted her to descend; "now the police have arrived, there will be no more—"

The sentence was never finished. As Mrs. Sterling's delicate kid boot touched the ground, the frieze-coated Irishman with the fell of unkempt red hair and the plastered face came rushing forward, caught the handsome Virginian planter by the throat, twisting his hand in Mr. Sterling's cravat so as nearly to strangle him, and with the other hand clutched Mrs. Sterling rudely by the arm.

"William Hood," cried this strange immigrant, "you are my prisoner on a charge of felony, in the name of her Majesty the Queen of England. And you, too, Mr. Montgomery Hood. Sergeant Briggs, help me to secure the prisoners."

The supposed Paddy's hat and blue cotton kerchief had fallen off in the scuffle, his wig of fiery red hair was awry. It was Inspector Wilkins who stood before me, holding my charming American fellow-travellers in his professional grip. We detectives are not easily astonished, but here the surprise beat anything I had ever seen, even on the stage, and for once I stood stupid and staring, with my eyes fixed on the group. Then there was an explosion of fierce curses and threats, a cry of alarm, and I recovered my wits only just in time to strike up the pistol which that little fury, young Montgomery Hood, was discharging at his captor's head. Bang went the pistol, the ball going into the wall above us; and then a desperate struggle ensued, for the elder culprit, who had a revolver under his coat, tried hard to shake himself free of the inspector, whilst false Mrs. Sterling fought like a wild-cat, and it was not until his finery was in tatters, and his face covered with blood, that I could get the upper hand of the younger delinquent. Even then we could hardly have handcuffed them both but for the aid of the Albany police, who came hurrying up at the report of the pistol.

"It's all right and square, gentlemen," said the inspector, producing the papers; "warrant of the British Secretary of State, countersigned, as you see, Extradition warrant, backed by all the proper authorities in Washington and the State of New York. We've a good right to our birds, you see, now we've put salt on their tails."

For all that, it was a lucky thing for us that so many policemen were on the spot, for the Irish—whose antipathy to laws in general, and English law in particular, made them regard the arrest on American soil as an insult to themselves and their adopted country—threatened a rescue. Nothing came of the menace, however, save hooting and hard words, and we were permitted to carry our captives quietly off to New York. I had rather not dwell too much on my own thoughts during the journey. I felt humbled, both as a man and a detective. That I, who had counted on the success of this expedition as the stepping-stone to fortune—that I should have been gulled and duped as I had been—the deception was too complete; I could not bear to think of it.

"This," said the inspector, the first time we were alone together, which was on board the packet, homeward bound—for till then we dared not trust the prisoners, sullen and apathetic now, out of sight—"this is the long and short of it. I chose to follow the young one to Canada, because I thought he'd be more easy to track than his brother. Lads of his age don't often travel alone, you see. Well, he was deeper than I thought. I followed him to Detroit, and then he doubled and twisted, and I lost the scent for a time. A trifle—only, you know, Briggs, nothing is a trifle to us; straws show the way the wind blows—sent me to New York, and there I hunted about for day after day, and heard you were at work there too, and had some trouble not to run against you as we went to and fro, like a couple of hounds at fault. One day, in Jersey City—I'd gone there on the chance—I saw a coffee-house keeper standing at his own door, smoking. I knew the face, and a thing or two about the chap it belonged to—a German, of the name of Hans Molder.

"It was nigh six years since I had seen Hans, and he did not know me at first, but when I began to talk to him and remind him of old times, he was fit to faint. You never saw such a coward. To be sure, there were warrants out against him years ago in London, for an ugly business, too, and Hans most likely thought he was wanted across the Atlantic. Well, that was wholesome fear to encourage, so I began to question him a bit about our hide-and-seek friends in the cabin here, and he blurted out some blundering admission in his fright, and I was down upon him. Down on him I was, especially hard—to write to England and to Lord Lyons for instructions, and so forth. Hans was well off, and did not fancy the C. C. C. and penal servitude, so I put the screw on and tugged the truth out of him.

"And the truth was this: The Hoods had been hid at his house; he was an old acquaintance of William's, and at his house Montgomery Hood had put on the female attire that was to serve as a disguise. It was his brother William's plan and no bad one either, he knowing pursuit would be hot; and Mrs. Molder, who was a dressmaker, she went to New York and bought the fal-lals and finery. Off the rogues went in the character of bride and bridegroom, to the Mountain House, and thence towards the great lakes where Montgomery would have put on his own clothes again and so to California. I was but a few hours after them, and made up as an immigrant, the better to effect the capture, knowing they were armed. And so we've got them safe and most of the cash; but to see you, Briggs, doing the civil thing to that artful humbug of a defaulter in the lace veil! Well, I won't laugh if it hurts your feelings."

My tale is nearly told. The Hoods were tried and convicted, of course, and William received a heavy sentence, no less than twenty years of penal servitude. As for Montgomery, as it was proved that he was very much under the influence of his elder brother, and had gone into the robbery more from a schoolboy spirit of mischief than a serious desire to pillage his employers, he was more leniently dealt with. But the laugh at Scotland Yard was terribly against me, and I found it impossible to remain in the department, tormented as I was on the score of my credulity and the sham Mrs. Sterling. Inspector Wilkins got the reward, as was fair. And the superintendent hinted that there was a vacancy among the sergeants of the L division, and that the work would suit me better than my old trade.

However, by great good luck, the chief of the borough police in my native town happened to retire just then, and as no other townsman was eligible, and I had local influence, I got the place, and a snug one it is. But for all that, when London detectives come down and confer with Mr. Superintendent Briggs, polite as they are, I can see by the slight twinkle in their eyes that they have heard the story of my American expedition, and are laughing in their sleeves.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

We may, indeed, agree by a sacrifice of truth, to call that purple which we see to be yellow, as we may agree by a still more profligate sacrifice of every noble feeling, to offer to tyranny the homage of our adulation; to say to the murderer of Thrasea Pætus: "Thou hast done well;" to the parricide who murdered Agrippina: "Thou hast done more than well." As every new victim falls, we may lift our voice in still louder flattery. We may fall at the proud feet, we may beg as a boon the honor of kissing that bloody hand which has been lifted against the helpless. We may do more; we may bring the altar and the sacrifice and implore the good not to ascend too soon to heaven. This we may do; for this we have the sad remembrance that beings of a human form and soul have done. But this is all we can do. We can constrain our tongues to be false; our features to bend themselves to the semblance of that passionate adoration which we wish to express; our knees to fall prostrate; but our heart we cannot constrain. There, virtue must still have a voice, which is not to be drowned by hymns and acclamations; there the crimes which we laud as virtues, are crimes still; and he whom we have made a god is the most contemptible of mankind; if, indeed, we do not feel, perhaps, that we ourselves are still more contemptible.—Brown's Moral Philosophy—Lecture lxxviii.

To train the student to power of thought and utterance, let him be left, and still more encouraged, to free investigation. . . The mind grows by free action. Confine it to beaten paths, prescribe to it the results in which all study must end, and you rob it of elasticity and life. It will never spread to its full dimensions. Teach the young man that the instructions of others are designed to quicken, not supersede his own activity, that he has a divine intellect for which he is to answer to God, and that to surrender it to another is to cast the crown from his head, and to yield up his noblest birthright. Encourage him in all great questions to hear both sides, and to meet fairly the point of every hostile argument. Guard him against tampering with his own mind, against silencing its whispers and objections, that he may enjoy a favorite opinion undisturbed. Do not give him the shadow for the substance of freedom, by telling him to inquire, but prescribing to him the convictions at which he must stop. Better show him honestly his chains than mock the slave with the show of liberty.—Channing On the Christian Ministry.

When we would show any one that he is mistaken, our best course is to observe on what side he considers the subject, for his view of it is generally right on this side, and admit to him that he is right so far. He will be satisfied with this acknowledgment, that he was not wrong in his judgment, but only inadvertent in not looking at the whole of the case. For we are less ashamed of not having seen the whole than of being deceived in what we do see; and this may, perhaps, arise from an impossibility of the understandings being deceived in, what it does see, just as the perceptions of the senses, as such, must always be true.—Pascal.

We often have seen in the columns of religious newspapers sketches of eminent Christians. I read one lately of a farmer's wife who used to delight in prayer-meetings, celebrated her children's birthdays by prayer, and spent whole days in praying. All these are favorable signs; but before I pronounce her an eminent Christian, I should like to know whether, previous to her withdrawal from the family circle to pray all day, she made any provision for the extra labor that her absence would devolve on others, or whether Bridget had to skim the milk and wash the pans, besides cooking, sweeping and dusting, or whether the work was let go till the next day; and if so, whether the next day went smoothly. I should like to know whether, when a little, restless, chubby hand upset the gravy-boat on the clean table-cloth, she bound herself over to keep the peace; whether in her house cleanliness was made subservient to comfort, or comfort to cleanliness; whether she ever laid down her sewing and took into her arms the half-sick and wholly-cross, fretful and miserable four-year-old boy, to charm away his unhappiness with a fairy story, or any kind of story, or song, or simple talk; whether she gave her heretical neighbor credit for as much candor, sincerity, truthfulness, earnestness, and unselfishness in his religion as he developed and she recognized in his character of citizen, neighbor and father; whether the delicious green-pea soup that she sent in to the sick woman next door was the result of an extra amount made for the purpose; or whether the Irish girl dined per force, that day, off cold boiled pork and potatoes; whether she was generally ready to step into the wagon when it came to the door on Sunday morning, or whether she provoked her husband to wrath by keeping them all waiting.—Stumbling Blocks, by Gail Hamilton.

Both are Right.—Tom Moore compared love to a potato "because it shoots from the eyes," "or rather," exclaimed Byron, "because it becomes less by paring."

DROWNED! DROWNED!!

'TIS said when drowning, snatched from life and light,
When drowning in sad waters deep and wide,
When drowning, that the water and the wave
Do moan most musically, and singing, sigh
In tenderest tones, and witching wild refrains,
That enter at the ear and fill the brain
With music, quieting; and that the soul
Is fraught with harmony, and urged to leave
Its transient habitation i' the clay,
And seek that far-beyond, we know not of.

The body's tenantless sleep is all a-cold;
And coming tides slow bear it to the strand,
Among the rushes; and the fingers close
In icy clasp among the rushes, while
The ripples, each in turn, slip up the shore,
And kiss the feet, and close about the hands,
And twine the hair among the roots, and trail,
The long sea-grasses over all the form
In slimy ribbons.

Then the tides recede
And leave the body, pale and lank and cold,
All in the silence of night, upon the strand—
Sad waters moaning for the still dead form,
The soulless body, sleeping on the strand.
And after
A bleached skull, out staring the bold sun—
The mystery of birth, and age, and name—
The secret of the soul's flight, and the blank
And wordless story of a shattered life!
* * * * * * * * *
The rattling reeds, and the salt-odored sea
In tireless waves—the hollow autumn wind
Tossing among the rushes—and one star
Dropping pearl shadows in the empty bowls
That held the eyes once in this withered skull!

CHAS. WARREN STODDARD.

NEW BOOKS.

NEVER a steamer comes without bringing new books to Roman. Literature so multiplies on his hands that he sends books around to all his friends. This week we have not time to read the five fresh volumes which he places upon our table; and unfortunately not one of them has a preface to tell what it is all about. There was a time when authors never thought of printing a book without a preface, and in this preface the plot and plan and purpose and intent of the volume, were summed up so that one could arrive at the gist of the story, and write quite a creditable and appreciative notice of the book without reading it. They have changed all that now. True, some publishers send out printed notices with each new book—sometimes as many as a half dozen, so that the reviewer can take his choice; but this does not atone for the loss of the old-fashioned preface.

For instance, here is Linnet's Trial, by S. M., the author of Twice Lost. Who "S. M." can be we have not the faintest idea, unless it be Sylvester Mowry; and his time is so much occupied in writing letters to the World and the Herald about Arizona and the mines, that we scarcely think he would have time to write about anything else. If there were anything in a name, Twice Lost might be by the author of Three Times Dead; but it isn't. A glance through the pages of the book convinces us that Linnet was a lady; and we learn that she married an army officer, and her husband was ordered to India. It does not appear that he sent her home any India shawls or any of the Begum's diamonds; and what is the use of having a husband in India if he doesn't send his wife such things? He might as well be at Brooklyn, or Benicia, or anywhere else. There is a mystery in which this husband's honor is concerned; and all the world gives him the cold shoulder with the exception of Lilian, who never goes back on him one minute. Those who wish to know more about the story, must buy the book and read it, for we have told them all we can. The publisher assures us "the story will have a brilliant run," and he ought to know.

If one asked us what The Bridal Eve is worth, we should reply "Southworth;" for it is by that lady. That Mrs. Southworth is a lady of letters is patent enough from her name, which is written down as Mrs. Emma D. E. N.—the Christian name in her case getting the better of the surname by three. Mrs. Southworth has written more books in her lifetime than any ordinary reader could get through in two. The fertility of her brain is wonderful. True, the books she has produced do not belong to the highest order of novels; but they suit the popular taste, and that is enough. It is a fatal mistake for an author to rise above the level of the masses, and one which a publisher never forgives. The Bridal Eve is one of that great class of books which are found at Napa springs, and lying around in the sitting rooms of half the houses in town. Can praise of the book further go?

In From Cape Cod to Dixie and the Tropics, by J. Milton Mackie, we have a pleasant and entertaining volume of travel. The author has travelled over the South—it was before "the blood-red blossom of war with its heart of fire" unfolded its fearful petals—and has seen the pleasant side of Southern life. Over the plantations, drinking juleps with the owners, driving out to Lake Pontchartrain, and then across to the Havana, and cruising among the West India Islands, goes our author. He eats oranges in the delicious groves, where the summer winds come laden with perfumes that the North knows only of through its poets; he stretches his limbs under the shade of tall palms, and enjoys the dolce far niente that prevails in those luscious climes—basks among the Bermudas, and then back to Cape Cod. Everywhere he finds pleasantness, and all his recollections are rose-colored. It is delightful in this day of bitterness to read such a book, for we are wearied of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth.

A novel by the author of Beulah merits more than passing mention. Notwithstanding a determination to skip over all the books of the week with the merest glance and mention, the name of Miss Evans on the title-page arrested our attention and we were soon lost in the tropical diction and florid imagery that characterizes this authoress. Macaria, or Altars of Sacrifice, is the title of the book. It opens well, and reminds one somewhat of Beulah. There is vigor without seeming effort, and sentiment without apparent affectation. Not until well into the book, two-thirds through it, do we find that it is a tale of the present time, of the throbbing, surging day that is breaking in waves of war upon the threshold of every home in the land. But Miss Evans is a Southern lady, and her hero becomes a Colonel when South Carolina secedes. He is foremost and eloquent in urging secession, and love is brought in to play the lightning's part amid the thunder bass of the story. The fall of Fort Sumter; the battles of the Peninsula, all come in for glowing descriptions; but the hero Colonel falls. The story throughout is clever and well told; the denoument, however, will scarcely satisfy the mass of readers, who always want to have a play or a tale end as their sympathies incline. Further we can only say that the logic is a woman's and the political shaping is what might have been expected from one of that impulsive but dear division of creation, that feels but never reasons.

The Spy Unmasked is a paper-bound volume, a story of the Revolution, and one of the series published by Putnam for "reading on the rail." Those who saw the Menken play the French Spy in somewhat primitive Arab costume, not long since, will, perhaps, think that she is artfully alluded to as "The Spy Unmasked." Not so; the book contains the adventures of Enoch Crosby, alias Harvey Birch. Harvey Birch will be recognized as the hero of Cooper's tale of The Neutral Ground. In this little volume we have a republication of a work which originally appeared in 1828. It is as interesting as a romance; and notwithstanding that the story professes to have been taken down "from his own lips in short hand," we cannot help thinking that it partakes greatly of romance. The multitude in this city who think Billy Birch a character and considerable of a fellow, will wonder when they come to read how his brother Harvey raised him in the old Revolution times.

While mentioning this railway reading, we notice that Annie and Her Master has been republished in this neat and cheap form. At the time of transferring the story to THE CALIFORNIAN's columns, we thought that some shrewd Eastern publisher would think it worthy of a reprint, and were just enabled to distance Putnam. Those who wish the story can get it, and a small library besides, by buying back numbers of THE CALIFORNIAN, the cost being about the same as that of the story in its republished form. Some idea of the cheapness of THE CALIFORNIAN may be gained from this. Annie and Her Master is contained in four numbers, and only fills perhaps a sixteenth part of each paper. Decidedly, if any wish to get the story, and a wealth of excellent reading besides, let them buy back numbers of THE CALIFORNIAN.

ROBERT BROWNING'S NEW WORK.—Robert Browning's new work will add much to the poet's reputation. Few poems can be named in which such deep tones are touched and with such delicacy as those in James Lea, a poem in which one scarcely knows which to admire most, the pathos or the strange ideas. There is said to be more than a poetic demolition of Mr. Home in Mr. Sludge, the Medium, even some sharp thrusts at various persons who still shield and fawn upon him after having found him guilty of fraud. The story runs that a lady and gentleman of eminence, devout spiritualists, residing at Rome, confessed to Mr. Browning that during Mr. Home's stay at their house they once forbade his putting his hand under the table, and the spirits wouldn't rap, and Home burst into tears and confessed that on that occasion only he had deceived them; that on one other occasion he had put phosphorus on the tips of wires and stretched them from the roof of their house to represent certain spiritual apparitions. "And what did you say, how did you act, upon the discovery?" asked Mr. Browning. "Oh," replied the lady, "I rebuked him severely; told him plainly how shameful it was that one who had been so supernaturally gifted should act so, and told him that he ought to repent." "And he still remained with you, and—" "Oh, yes, we are perfectly sure that everything was genuine afterward." Upon which the poet was so disgusted that he vented his indignation in Mr. Sludge. Hiram Powers also detected Home in frauds, and still shields and professes to believe in him. Home's name is, by the way, neither Home nor Hume, but some alias—Smith or Jones possibly. Gold Hair, the Legend of Pornic, was written at Pornic, where Mr. B. and his son spent several months last spring. This son, called Pinna but named Robert, is a fine lad, and is very like that brother of Mrs. Browning, whose early death by drowning cast such a shadow on her life.

LOVE POWDER.—Dr. L. D——, of Paris, lately fell head-over-ears quite out of his depth in love with a patient. Modesty forbade him to speak, so he wrote and left the note on the table. The servant saw him put it down, and naturally took the declaration for a prescription, and, as he usually did, carried it at once to the family chemist. Imagine the poor doctor's horror when, the next day, he received the paper back, with a remark from the chemist, "that he feared he could not make up what he wanted."

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, July 22nd, 1864.

THIS Friday evening finds me worried and tired. The weather during the week has been disagreeable and dusty; it has been impossible to drive, hazardous to ride and not particularly pleasant to walk.

Mines which should have gone up have gone down, and mines which by all the laws of trade and of nature should have gone down have gone up.

The Mexican steamer which should have brought me bullion from my mine did not even bring me news from the Superintendent. From an outside source, however, I learn that he is out of powder, which probably accounts for the otherwise singular fact that he made no report. Neither did the Mexican mail bring me my commission from Maximilian as Duc de Chihuahua, though I confidently counted upon that honor. Gwin in the meanwhile will be monarch of all he surveys and a great deal more, while I am compelled to toil on in virtuous but uncomfortable indigence.

In the words of a poet whom all of us love and some of us reverence:

'Twas ever thus, from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest wishes fade;
I never held the red right-bower,
But what the dealer turned a spade.

I can't exactly say that my dish always happens to be bottom-side up when it rains, for in that case the fault would be mine alone. As a general thing, I manage to keep my dish right-side up the better part of the time; but somehow it always contrives to rain all around it. Even when a few drops do fall in my dish, it doesn't seem to hold water. Decidedly, there is something wrong.

Looking around, I see men on every hand who have an income of more money in a month than I could count in a year. And yet they don't live any better than anybody else; not quite so well as their neighbors, perhaps.

In place of having snug little boxes in the country, and pictures and music and books around them, and everything else that is jolly, homes of their own and wives of their own, for that matter, they either board or else have rooms at an inaccessible height in some inconvenient hotel.

Heaven is very apt to send almonds to those who have no teeth.

Now I, metaphorically speaking, have an excellent provision of teeth; but what is the use of having teeth without almonds? Yea, and without even a peanut to practice on?

The difficulty with which I make money is only equalled by the ease with which I can spend it. It may seem egotistical to boast of one's own accomplishments, but I do think I can make less money in a year and spend more than any other man in the State.

After all, I don't know, however, but what I am as rich and perhaps richer than the average of my neighbors, who are always debating whether they can afford this or that. For if I see a thing that I want, which costs two bits, and happen to have two bits in my pocket, I can always afford it.

There are some among us, however, who have money, and who also have considerable expertness in spending it. They get up little impromptu affairs, balls, suppers, etc., that cost several thousand dollars, and are only sorry that they don't cost more.

An instance of this occurred the other evening. One of the crowd got married. The others clubbed together, put in a hundred or two dollars each, and bought a band—they didn't hire the band; they bought it out and out, instruments and all.

They hired ten carriages and drove to the top of the highest hill in town, the bower where the happy couple resided, and serenaded them. They commanded the most extensive and expensive music to be played—none of your cheap airs, but sterling tunes, every note of which is equivalent to a legal tender.

They brought the bridegroom down and accepted his invitation to enter the bower. They drank connubial champagne, and smoked conjugal cigars, and had matrimonial music on the piano.

After a nice little call of two or three hours duration the Governor-General electrified and astonished the mourners by proposing to sing "We won't go home till morning," illustrating the music by the deed. The bridegroom said that suited him and requested them to go in. They did. A dance was proposed. The Governor-General took the floor with Mr. Park (Bay View.) If one of John Phœnix's Goitometers had been properly attached to each of the couple the indicator would have probably marked off fifteen miles of square dancing to the hour. The thing took. All pulled off their coats and went in. Savage pirouetted with Gould and Curry, and Ophir waltzed with Mexican. There were more feet represented on the floor than are often seen in one gathering.

Long life, health and happiness were wished in all manner of intonations to the bridegroom, but no one manifested any intention of going until shakedowns were proffered them upon the floor. Then there was a general getting up and getting.

In the early gray of the morning, after one farewell tune, 'The boys we left behind us," the party wended their way to their respective homes, leaving the bridegroom looking rather unhappy to think that the day had gone by when he could go out and return unquestioned at that hour. And with the others, to his home went

INIGO.

"LONELY."

The cold dark day wails out its song
To the busy city's hurrying throng,
And my heart sends echo to the tone
Of the wailing wind's unearthly moan.

Sad and drear, as the falling rain,
The olden days come up again;
But all the days of the vanished past
Have brought me only pain at last.

And yet they in their gilded light,
To mock my soul in its sad, dark night,
Ever will come, as they do to-day,
Like the moan of the ocean far away.

Yes, very sad and full of pain,
The old days come with the falling rain;
But, oh! for all the joy that's fled,
They bring me only pain instead.

INGLE.

A WORD ABOUT THE "FLORENCE" SEWING MACHINE COMPANY.—The Florence Sewing Machine Company, at Florence, Massachusetts, may be classed among public benefactors for presenting to the world their great labor-saving instrument—admitted to be, by all who have made the comparison, the most perfect machine, in all respects, ever given to the public. The four best and most popular styles of stitch, the lock, knot, double lock and double knot, are all made on it, and the change from one to the other is the work of an instant. This fact alone places the "Florence" Machine at the very pinnacle of ingenious inventions The immense number of these machines sold at the office in this city, 111 Montgomery street, is the best endorsement they could have at the hands of the public.

GROVER & BAKER'S MACHINE.—We speak from experience, having one in use in our family, when we claim for the Grover & Baker Sewing-Machine all the merit which they represent it to posses. Parties have only to call at the Grover & Baker sales-room, and witness the perfect working of their machine on every variety of fabric, either the most delicate guaze tissue or the heaviest soldier's over coat, and doing each with such perfection and rapidity, as to convince any person wanting a sewing-machine that they can here find a perfect one. Besides doing ordinary sewing this is the only machine which successfully makes that beautiful embroidery stitch now almost indispensable for ornamenting ladies' and children's garments, of which a great variety of styles and patterns are on exhibition at their office. Those indispensable features of sewing—strength, uniformity, and elasticity—all of which are brought out in this incomparable invention, make it the first sewing-machine in the world.

THE EUREKA BILLIARD SALOON—over the Eureka Theatre, on Montgomery street, between California and Pine—is the most superbly fitted-up establishment on the Pacific Coast. It contains seven of Jacob Strahle's tables, unequalled by any other in elegance of style and finish. Messrs. Fitch & Wetherbee are the gentlemanly proprietors, and so conduct their establishment as to merit and maintain the leading patronage of gentlemanly knights of the cue, of the city and State. jul8

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following are the notices which appear in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the CALIFORNIAN is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest publication known to us. The CALIFORNIAN is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call. June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-bred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new candidate for public favor, in the shape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to conduct such a journal with credit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

CALIFORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the CALIFORNIAN, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper, owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

THE first number of the CALIFORNIAN, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The CALIFORNIAN contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

And the following we clip from the exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have received the second number of the new hebdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under the above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The high literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgment displayed in its selections, and its neat typographical execution, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a large and neatly printed weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" the first number from our table before we had examined it; the second number, however, is before us, and we find it filled with reading matter, original and selected, of the highest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured that they will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attainments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. The journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the CALIFORNIAN appears to be, and if the publisher will send us his journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best bow on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat and plain in typography, and gives evidence of the best of editorial talent.—Placerville Weekly News.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the name of a new weekly literary paper which is to make its début in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the business affairs of his journal properly, it is sure to succeed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of

WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

THE CALIFORNIA COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE,

FOR GIRLS,

Nos. 64, 66, 68 and 70 SILVER STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

MRS. M. B. SWEDENSTIERNA, PRINCIPAL.

TWELFTH SESSION,

Commencing August 8th, 1864.

THIS INSTITUTION IS DESIGNED TO AFFORD FACILities for the education of girls, fully equal to those furnished at the best Seminaries of the Atlantic States. The course of study is unusually comprehensive, embracing all the branches that the best modern authorities have thought could be advantageously incorporated in the most enlarged scheme of Female Education. In the Collegiate Department it includes the higher mathematics; a course of English Literature and Criticism, taught by a method not elsewhere pursued; Natural History; the Physical Geography of the Pacific Coast; Critical and Universal Grammar; Ecclesiastical History; and the modern applications of Physical Science.

The organization of the School into departments and graded classes, facilitates the pursuit of a regular and systematic course of study. No pupil is permitted to take up the higher branches until thoroughly grounded in the preparatory ones. In the advanced classes, the instruction is to a great extent independent of text-books; and in no case is "going through the book," considered equivalent to "finishing a study."

Calisthenics, consisting of the wand-exercise, etc., take place in the gymnasium daily, from 12 to 12 1-2 o'clock.

Parents, guardians, and others interested in the thorough education of girls, are invited to call and witness for themselves the methods of instruction pursued, the general organization of the school, and its daily workings, which furnish a more reliable test of the excellence of such institutions, than any public examination. No particular "visiting days" have been appointed, the Principal and teachers being gratified by the attendance of visitors, at their daily recitations, at any time and without unusual preparation. Such visits do not in any way interrupt or interfere with the regular routine.

Registers containing full particulars as to the course of study, terms, regulations, etc., can be obtained upon application by mail, or to the Principal personally, at the Seminary. jy16-tf

THE UNDERSIGNED GIVE NOTICE THAT THE above named corporation has been organized for the purpose of carrying on the Banking and Exchange business in all its branches, in this city and with the interior of this State, the neighboring State and Territories, and with Mexico; also with the Atlantic cities, Europe, China and the East Indies, for which they are provided with ample facilities, and in conformity with articles of association will commence operations on the 5th day of July next, at the Banking House now occupied by Donohoe, Ralston & Co., corner of Washington and Battery streets.

With the view of giving to the business of the corporation all the efficiency and promptitude of a private banking firm, together with that confidential seclusion of private business matters so generally desired, the immediate management of its affairs is committed exclusively to D. O. Mills and William C. Ralston, as President and Cashier, respectively, to whom, or either of them, the customers of the Bank will apply in all business matters. The regular meetings of the Board of Trustees will take place monthly.

The undersigned deem it advisable to call particular attention to the following peculiarities of their organization, which are positively binding on all its members:

First—Sales of its capital stock can be effected only after due appraisement by stockholders selected for that special purpose; and the Trustees of the corporation have, in all cases, the right to become purchasers of the stock appraised at the appraisement, for the benefit of the remaining stockholders. This restriction is printed upon each certificate of stock.

Second—Loans cannot be made to stockholders, except upon collaterals other than their shares in the capital stock of this bank.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which by some injudicious prescription had been converted into an asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

For that is an article calculated to remove rather than to produce asthmatic affections. And as for COUGHS AND COLDS, the world never saw a better remedy, and never will, until nature produces some new ingredient out of which to prepare it. Don't be afraid to use it freely. Every article in it is from nature's own laboratory—the same today as they were a thousand years ago—all calculated to soothe, heal and strengthen. There is no

Keep it in the house, use it freely yourself, and give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold. By so doing you may save yourself many days and nights of care, anxiety and watchfulness so inseparably connected with the chamber of the sick. jy2

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, DR. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be heated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, had treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute. Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, July 30th, 1864.

SOME one—Tupper probably, it sounds like him—says:

This world is all a fleeting show
For man's illusion given, and I don't know but what he's about half right.

Had he said that it isn't much of a show after all, and that the only private box to be desired in it is a pine one, of oblong make, perhaps he would come still nearer the truth. For sometimes the plot of the play becomes intolerably stupid, the performers are so illy up in their parts and make such prodigious guys and fools of themselves generally, that I think the performance has lasted about long enough, and the sooner the curtain is run down and the gas turned off the better.

The curtain will be rung down some day, and about our ears, too, unless these earthquakes let up on us. This game of "shaking props" has been going on for a good while, and some day, I fancy, we'll discover there's a limit to it. Earthquakes are becoming lamentably frequent of late and extraordinary violent. There was a time when they rocked us so gently that we could pat them, the agitation of Telegraph Hill reminding us of the tremulous and pleased wag of a poodle's tail, but it is different now. The growl is that of a mastiff and an angry light looks out from the fissures in the earth. A little larger charge of powder some day, and there'll be a fall in real estate about here that will surprise people. The base of Telegraph Hill is loosened already, and it rocks in the wind like a tall elm. Those who own houses up there had better move, or some day they'll find the bottom dropping out. I don't go much on Telegraph Hill now-a-days; there was a time when I'd have chanced considerable on it, but the conviction has gradually grown in my mind that it is as shaky as the rest of the population, and so last week I gave orders to have all my property there put under the hammer.

As I intend to take a trip through the country with the proceeds of the sale, I suppose they'll put it under a trip-hammer.

I should have preferred to dispose of my property at private sale, but it is so difficult to point it out and show it, and so vexatious to be bothered by questions about title and all that, that I determined upon the public method. For the benefit, however, of parties wishing to buy, I'll describe my lot, and then if they like, I'm ready for a trade:

'Tis an up-hill lot, this lot of mine. How many varas it may contain I don't know, but it certainly is very varied. To say that it is a pleasant lot, and that the prospect is fine would be to say what is false; but to say that it is susceptible of improvement, would be to state the exact truth. At present it produces nothing to speak of except a few wild oats, and these are of use to nobody but the owner. There is no Lot's wife in the business—not even a wife with a lot. It is hard, rugged and barren; there are stones at every turn and corner, and a flower in it is as rare as reason in a woman or modesty in a man—but for all that I don't know that I'd care to trade with many people on this coast. For it is my own, and I intend to make something of it yet. . . .

There is very little going on in town at present. Theatres are comparatively unattended, the opera figuratively languishes, and merchants lean their unoccupied elbows listlessly upon their idle counters. The only shop that is doing a thriving business at present is Alcatraz. That thrives.

It is doing well; indeed, we might say it is doing Weller.

Some people are afraid of Alcatraz. I am not. It is a pleasant place enough, and one could pass the summer there very comfortably, if he had the right kind of company. I can't exactly say that I'd like to be locked up in the same cell with a Secessionist, or even in an adjoining one; but it they took to confining female prisoners I do think it would be hard to keep people out.

One thing about Alcatraz, it offers a charming asylum to one who is tired of the excitement of San Francisco life and desires a little change.

Understand me—I do not complain of San Francisco, for it is a charming place to live in. It offers the stranger two of the most delightful sensations in life. One of these is the pleasure of coming here, and this only equalled by the other—the ecstatic joy of going away.

In fact, the sojourner in San Francisco always has something to look forward to from the time he first places his feet on these shores. The period of his departure is a bright light in the future, and to this he can always turn with hope when everything else looks dark. Do not misunderstand me: I intend to say nothing derogatory to the country or the climate. Both, in their way, are beyond criticism. I do not deny that this coast is an excellent place to come to. I only claim that it is the best place to go away from that can be found in the known world. . . .

We have had a season of English opera at the Academy lately; a new contralto making her appearance in Linda di Chamounix. I wish, by the way, that in pronouncing the name of that opera, people would remember that it furnishes one of the cases in which they should never say die—the Italian i being the equivalent in sound of our English e.

It is not my intention to criticise the opera and the contralto further than to remark that I think all operas stupid, and all blondes charming. The charm of the début to me was the opportunity it offered of seeing a woman experimenting in trowsers for the first time. To me it was philosophically funny. "Pierotto" placed evident distrust in the male habiliments, and mutely deprecated being obliged to appear without the accustomed feminine drapery, managing her guitar as though it were a fig-leaf thrown in to the costume by the considerate composer for her especial benefit. I sympathized with the little lady. For the exigencies of life may at some future period compel me to appear in petticoats, and unless I fainted away, under those circumstances it is tolerably certain that some of the audience would. . . .

I had an idle hour the other day, and hence the following verses to

OUR IDOLS.

Poor idols! how they fade and fall
Our temple hearts within,
And but the niches in the wall
Tell where their forms have been.

Alas! you cry, is Love then naught,
And Faith all lifeless grown?
Not so—the ruin is not wrought
By fickle change alone.

We love not what our idols are—
We worshipped what they seemed,
And had we bowed us from afar,
We still had loved and dreamed.

A star perhaps were not a star
If one could reach the skies—
A touch tells what our idols are,
And then devotion dies.

We near the shrine, but woe the day
That tempts the tender trust!
We find their feet are made of clay,
And hurl them to the dust.

So from their stems the ruthless blast
Snaps fair but fragile flowers—
The sin of the Iconoclast
Is ever, ever ours!

It will be seen that the sin of the Iconoclast is ours, if the enemy is not.

I like to write verse, it is so easy; and one little idea can be made to go such a great ways. If I were the editor of a newspaper I think I'd write all my leading articles in anapestic lines and my financial articles in the Iambic or heroic measure.

The telegraphic news should be in little short lines, tingling like wires, and well adapted for a Lyre.

In short there are several other improvements in journalism which I intend to adopt when I become editor of a paper. An acquaintance with the rules of grammar and a slight knowledge of the classics will not be regarded as a serious disqualification on the part of any one applying for a situation, and an indiscriminate disregard for truth and decency will not ensure the person applying a position. If in some respects like these I did not effect a change you might call me anything else than

INIGO.

TWO COMRADES IN ARMS.

"COMRADE! I hear the beating of a drum,
Have reinforcements come?"
"There is no sound, save a lost whippoorwill Crying from yonder hill."

"Comrade! I see a spacious mansion stand, Built by my grandsire's hand."
"No honored ancestry have left a stone
That I may call my own."

"Beside its hearth my gentle lady warms
The sweet child in her arms."
"No tender wife upon her loving breast
Lulls babe of mine to rest."

"See! how her bright hair falls in golden showers, Twined with autumnal flowers."
"No waving hair, by fragant flowerets pressed,
Has my rough hand caressed."

"On what enchanted wings the swift time flies Charmed by those heavenly eyes."
"How dreary, and how long the sad hours seem!
Alas! I cannot dream."

"Again I hear the beating of a drum:
Comrade, has the foe come?
"Yes, that great foe—or friend—we all must meet,
Who never knows defeat."

* * * * * * * *

On the battle-ground, at the break of day,
Two lifeless soldiers lay;
One face looked pitiful with yearning pain,
As one who prays in vain;

The other wore a look divinely blest,
And, from his pulseless breast,
The picture of a lady and a child
Looked up to him and smiled.

DEATH OF GEN. MCPHERSON.—Gen. James B. McPherson was killed before Atlanta in the battle of July 22d. According to the brief telegraphic account, he got separated from his staff and was picked off by one of the enemy's sharpshooters. Gen. McPherson was well known to our citizens, having been for some time stationed at Alcatraz. While among us he won friends by his courteous bearing and attractive social qualities, and during his period of active service at the East he secured admiration for his gallantry on several fields. He was a single man, though engaged to be married, we believe, and about 40 years old.

THE Alta says that Commodore Poor, of the Saranac, with his suite, returned a visit from Gen. Wright by calling upon him in full military costume. Probably the Commodore and his suite put off their naval uniform and wore the military on the occasion, in compliment to the General, who is unfortunately in the land service. So far as taste is concerned, however, the naval uniform is much the prettier of the two.

A FOREIGN PAPER tells us that a woman lately died in the department of Gironde, France, who prolonged her life to one hundred and six years by living principally on garlic and shalots. She must have been the original "Lady of Shalott."

THE greatest part of mankind use their first years to make their last miserable.

MEMORY.

Nessun maggior dolore
Che recordarsi del tempo felici,
Nella miseria.—Dante.

I.

STAND on a funeral mound,
Far, far from all that love thee,
With a barren heath around,
And a cypress bower above thee:
And think, while the sad wind frets,
And the night in cold gloom closes,
Of spring, and spring's sweet violets,
Of summer, and summer's roses.

II.

Sleep where the thunders fly
Across the tossing billow—
Thy canopy the sky,
And the lonely deck thy pillow:
And dream, while the chill sea-foam
In mockery dashes o'er thee,
Of the cheerful hearth, and the quiet home,
And the kiss of her that bore thee.

III.

Watch in the deepest cell
Of the foeman's dungeon tower.
Till hope's most cherished spell
Has lost its cheering power:
And sing, while the galling chain
On every stiff limb freezes,
Of the huntsman hurrying o'er the plain,
Of the breath of the mountain breezes.

IV.

Talk of the minstrel's lute,
The warrior's high endeavor,
When the honeyed lips are mute,
And the strong arm crushed forever:
Look back to the summer sun,
From the mist of dark December;
Then say to the broken-hearted one,
"'Tis pleasant to remember!"

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XVII.

I WAS as if blinded by this evidence; but still could not bring myself to believe this shameful treachery of my guardian. I still wished only to accuse Placide; but how could it be supposed that he would have risked so much without the consent of M. de Maufert? Was not complicity manifest? He sided with his steward, and permitted them to declare me mad.

All night I argued in my mind the most extreme measures. All illusion was vain, the danger unveiled before me; I was lost if I allowed myself to be thus degraded, without some protestation. It was necessary to combat it—but then, victorious or vanquished, I must quit the chateau and Diana—all that I loved! At this terrible idea my heart ceased to beat, and I asked myself if it would not be better to submit to this abasement by which I was menaced and continue near her. A prey to the most cruel suffering, I tried next day to dissimulate the agitation which oppressed me. Diana questioned me anxiously, and her anxiety added to my distress. In order to reassure her, I made pretext of a fit of melancholy.

"What!" said she to me, "are you so devoid of energy that you cannot throw off an attack of spleen? You, a man—you, who are twenty years old—who can go forward in life upheld by a large fortune and a great name. Ah, my friend, leave these puerile sorrows to us poor women. What would you do before real trouble if you cannot protect yourself from an imaginary one? Oh, if I were a man!"

There was in her voice such an accent of pride that I felt ashamed of my cowardly hesitations. I felt that to desert my cause was to degrade myself in her eyes. The same evening I wrote a note to my lawyer, making an appointment, and on the morning of the day after I went to Monthermé.

M. Granger was one of those old-style country lawyers who are still to be found in the provinces, who live and die between two walls; he drew up my mother's marriage certificate, he was a member of the family council, and I was certain of finding a friend in him, as he did not like M. de Maufert at all. At eight in the morning I found him in his study; he welcomed me with a sort of pleasantness, at the same time respectful and protecting.

"Ah, Baron," said he, "what good wind blows you here? A serious affair you wrote me. What new freak, eh? At any rate, I am delighted that you take me for confessor; that gives me at least the pleasure of seeing you."

"My dear Granger," replied I, "you have said the word which best characterizes my proceeding: it is a confessor as well as a friend and counsellor that I need, for the subject that brings me here is of the most serious nature."

"Diable! what do you mean? Speak, Baron, you know that I am with you."

I commenced the recital, detailed the circumstances which revealed to me those strange reports, supposed by me at first to have been provoked by the hatred that the harshness of M. de Maufert had excited. At last I spoke of my quarrel with Placide, and all that followed, from the warnings of Father Abraham, to my altercation with my guardian. Granger listened to me with an air full of care, and it was easy for me to see that he was not at all surprised at such a communication, when I had related the facts without any commentaries.

"Now, my dear Granger," added I, "be the judge; perhaps in all this I have been too much hurt not to have yielded somewhat to passion. It concerns my future, and I leave it in your hands."

He stopped a moment without replying, shaking his head with the air of a man who reflects.

"Baron, this is very serious," said he, at last; "very serious!"

"So you yourself believe these infamous accusations?"

"No, no!" he replied quickly; "you do not understand me. It is a serious thing to bring up such questions. Remember that if your suspicions were correct, M. de Maufert would be dishonored by the justifiable withdrawal of your guardianship—an extreme measure, which the tribunal rarely permits."

"Your advice is, then, that I ought to allow myself to be annihilated without protestation?"

"It is very serious," continued the lawyer, "to directly attack M. de Maufert; it may be very dangerous for you."

"Why dangerous, if he is false to his duties of guardian and relations?"

"This is what we must prove. You are in a difficult situation; your age and your enormous fortune—"

He hesitated; I understood him.

"Speak without fear, my friend," said I coolly; "and to aid you I will finish your thought. Yes, you fear, in fact, that I am threatened with madness."

He made a gesture of surprise at hearing me open this subject.

"No, no!" added he, quickly; "that was not what I was thinking of, I assure you."

"Then a single word," replied I, resolved to drive him into his entrenchments. "Give me your word that you do not believe in the culpable intentions of my guardian, and I will feel secure."

"That is precisely what embarrasses me, Baron, and you press me hard. It is not a small thing to be the security of M. de Maufert in such a case. Certainly, one cannot suspect him of a wish to appropriate your fortune. That would be impossible for him; he knows it. What would he first do? He already has a surplus revenue. Avarice, truly, has strange mysteries. The Count manages your fortune very well—too well, sometimes; he can surely gratify his passion. He piles up; he accumulates; he tyrannizes; he reigns over fifteen millions. What does it matter to a Regent if he does not wear the crown? He holds the power in his hands. He governs. Your majority will oblige him to restore the treasure which is life to him. In short—what more should I say? No, I will not be security for him; and I fear, like you, that, profiting by your situation, exceptional as it is, he will be tempted to commit an open iniquity with the inclination which I know in him. This is why I hesitate to advise. An outbreak might save everything, but it might also lose all."

"Well, be it so," replied I, "at least I will know my fate. I will shake off these anxieties which make me doubt myself. I believe I will lose my reason if this thing goes on. Just think of being obliged to rest six months, with the knowledge that the moment I come of age I will be robbed of my rights, and that to the end of my life I will be obliged to submit to guardianship; that, isolated from my fellows, I can neither speak, act, think nor live. I am decided. I know to what I expose myself. I have no father to defend me. I come to you, my friend—save me. Look at me. You see me—you hear me. Is it an idiot that speaks to you? Is it a fool that you see?"

"You reassure me," replied he, at last, "but it is my duty to tell you that we are undertaking a difficult job. Promise me not to proceed at all without consulting me."

"I promise."

"Then, Baron, it shall be done according to your wishes. At present it is necessary to come to an understanding. In this case we have nothing to argue against M. de Maufert. Everything tends to make us believe that Placide would not dare to commit such offenses against you without the consent of his master; and, perhaps, according to his orders. But we have no proof of this; and it will be necessary to have overwhelming proofs to induce the tribunal to oblige him to renounce his guardianship, as in six months his power expires. It is necessary for us to circumvent the difficulty, and outmanœuvre a formidable enemy. The only way to solve the question is to show a desire to take a long trip; or, better still, to pretend that you want to be a soldier. We will reflect on it. In this case we will call a meeting of your family council, and there having exposed your projects, you will conclude by a demand for your freedom."

"That they cannot refuse me, it seems to me," said I.

"Ah, there it is! Under any other circumstances success would not be doubtful when scarcely a half year separates you from your majority. But we must foresee the objections of M. de Maufert, and that will be easy, if his evil intentions have ripened in his malicious spirit."

"He will say that I am threatened with hereditary madness—perhaps, that I am already mad."

"I will be there to prove the contrary, and it will be finished."

"Unluckily, Baron, all will not be finished; and it is on this sensible point that the debate will turn. When we have got there, as you have resolved to fight, we will fight. After all, perhaps, it is better to face the danger and force the Count to unmask his designs."

It was then decided that Granger would apply to the Justice of the Peace, and desire a meeting of the family council as soon as possible; and after deciding as to our future conduct, we parted.

XVIII.

CONFIDENT in the justice of my cause, I would not doubt the issue of a debate where my weapons were reason, sustained by will and love. But, alas! what a price I was to pay for my liberty—to leave Diana! What would life be when no longer animated by her dear presence. However, if I faltered in this duel, where my social existence was at stake, I would become in the eyes of all—of her eyes—perhaps an object of pity.

Nevertheless, I was sufficiently master of myself to hide my trouble. A note from my lawyer acquainted me that the family council was convened for the middle of the month. I had still two weeks' respite, and I relished like a miser the supreme happiness of the present hour. My guardian had put himself, like me, upon a war footing. When he spoke to me I detected in his accents that cold politeness which is always employed between two declared enemies.

"Granger has convoked the family council," said he to me, one day. "It is at your wish, I imagine."

"Yes, sir," replied I.

"It is very well," said he, coldly, and passed on. I was thankful that he did not ask me this question before my godmother, for our quarrels had already much disquieted her. Love was always the great tranquilizer, and I was inspired by this sweet solitude. One morning I went into the mountains with Diana, to visit one of those poor families to whom she carried relief every week, and we were returning to the chateau, when, half way down the hill, Diana, feeling a little tired, sat down on a rock covered with moss.

"See, away down there," said she, "above the Wild Boar's Glen, the beautiful rainbows formed by the spray of the cascade."

She looked, and remained silent, as if some thought saddened her.

"You are pensive this morning, my dear godmother," said I, after a while.

"It is true, my friend," replied she; "pardon me for being so taciturn a companion."

"Pardon you! ah, what an idea! Would it not be better to share with me your sorrows?"

"Yes, I should do it, André; but it is precisely because I do not know how to broach the subject that you see me so thoughtful. Yet it is necessary that I nerve myself up to the attempt."

"You frighten me! Do you no longer believe in my devoted affection? Could you suffer a sorrow which I also would not feel."

"Ah," said she, in giving me her hand, "to admit such a thought would be to calumniate our friendship. Our pains and sorrows and joys have so long been mutual. You are my brother by choice, and I am your sister."

"Well, then, what makes you hesitate?"

"For fear of grieving you."

"All affliction is sweet to me if it comes from you. Remember that to hide from me the sorrow which I see is to shut me out of your confidence."

"André, my friend," continued she, in a trembling voice, "you alone bring life into this solitude, where I have but you to love. You know I would suffer if you were no longer here."

"Mon Dieu! what are you going to say to me?"

"My friend, I have wanted courage for some time to pronounce the cruel words. You must go away."

At this cruel decision which fell from her lips I forgot that I had already prepared myself for my exile.

"Oh, I am very unhappy," cried I. "You have read my heart, and now you send me away."

"André, what do you say? I send you away, when I would give half my happiness in this world that you might be happy!"

"Diana!" cried I, supplicatingly, "have pity on me: to leave you is to die."

In my excitement I threw myself on my knees, seized her hand and bathed it with tears.

"Be quiet!" said she, determinedly; "do not rob me of my self-respect;" and she melted in tears.

At the sight of this sorrow, I paused in shame. I was on the point of betraying myself. Already the sacrilegious confession was on my lips. One word more, and a gulf would have opened between us forever.

"Pardon! pardon!" murmured I.

Overcome by sobs, she veiled her hands, and I saw the tears glistening through her fingers.

"I will go away; I swear it to you," said I, sorrowfully.

We paused for an instant. She at last became calm.

"I thank you for your courage," said she, in a broken voice, turning away her eyes; "I will try to be as strong as you. Only stay a few days longer, until I prepare myself for this cruel separation."

We returned in silence. An unspeakable trouble agitated me; I was afraid of myself. As we re-entered Maufert the unexpected visit of some neighbors separated us, and I went to my own apartment.

Diana no longer doubted my love. All showed it to me; her hesitation, her trouble. She did not curse me, and when I nearly betrayed myself it was with a supplicating voice that she arrested the cry of my heart. "Do not rob me of my self-esteem," said she, in tears. I lost myself in foolish reveries. Her clemency opened before me an enchanting horizon which dazzled me. Good heaven! said I to myself; she returns my love. If she should, like me, be agitated by a sentiment of love, which duty obliges her to smother! All this went through my mind like a flash of lightning. I recalled the sudden embarrassments so frequent to her since the night when in the delirium of fever I revealed the secret of my soul, and that gleam of joy I detected on her face when the doctor declared against my going to England. I recalled that morning in the spring time, when riding near her I felt my heart awake; that day also when she spoke to me of going away. What a change since then!

Fascinated by the hope and by these remembrances, I did not dare to either believe or to doubt. My joy wounded me like sorrow, and my sorrow intoxicated me. My eyes tried to look into the future, and as in an enchanted vision, I saw our two souls joined in one of those mysterious unions which God reserves for such hearts. Both of them pure, we remained worthy of ourselves; never would a confession soil our lips. The consciousness of our love rendered us strong, and we would walk through life assured, confident, inaccessible to human miseries.

I passed a part of the day in contemplation before this new Aurora which dawned for me; my existence had thenceforth an object. Strengthened by faith, I threaded with a sure step the shoals of the world where timid spirits are lost. For her I would preserve intact those aspirations towards ideal beauty that seemed like a remembrance of Heaven. For her I would seek glory. All of a sudden my attention was riveted on a letter which my lawyer sent me that morning. Alas! what a fall. Unhappy me! I dreamed of Diana's love at a time when I was obliged to plead to establish myself as a reasonable creature.

When I saw her that evening I approached her trembling and confused. Happily her duties as chatelainé absorbed her. Withdrawn into a corner of the room, I allowed myself to be occupied by an old friend of my father's, who delighted to tell me stories of the chase, which relieved me from the trouble of talking. While listening to his stories I anxiously watched my godmother, to see if I could not discover on her face a reflection of the stories which agitated me. Her face was calm and impenetrable. I thought I divined an effort under her assumed cheerfulness. Once her eyes encountered mine; she blushed. They brought in tea; she came to me with a cup in her hand. By chance we were alone.

"André, you are angry with me," she said, with an anxious and disturbed air.

"What did you say?"

"I feel remorse for the pain I caused you this morning."

Angels of heaven! She seemed to implore my pardon. Then my importunate hunter came and separated us; but I had time to throw Diana a tender look, which spoke so plainly the devotion of my soul that she left me almost smiling.

The next day when she came into the garden, by my reception of her, she divined my resignation. I comprehended that I ought to spare her the pain of leave-taking.

"You are very good," said she, "and you wish to spare me even the regret of being obliged to appear cruel. André, you know that anxiety for your happiness alone could influence me to cause you pain."

"Yes, I know it," replied I, "and I thank you for having estimated my affection as equal to yours. I wish to be worthy of you, so that you may be proud of me."

"I love you thus, my friend; thank you for your generosity. This fearful word of separation has cost me much."

"Dear godmother, if you had not pronounced it I should have been obliged to."

"You thought, then, of going away?" said she astonished.

"Yes, I had resolved on it; but not without severe struggles. And since you have brought up the question of my future, in my turn I will confide in you. No matter what sorrow it may cost you."

"Mon Dieu! André, you frighten me."

"Oh, reassure yourself; it only concerns a debate between M. de Maufert and myself."

"That is precisely what causes me dreadful agonies. I am afraid of him for you; and that is also why I wanted him to go away."

"Is it for this reason?"

"How could I have otherwise acquired so much courage if it were not to save you?" said she, with an emotion that touched me to the bottom of my soul. "Speak, I beg of you," continued she; "for some time things have passed between you and M. de Maufert which I know nothing about. He knows how dear you are to me, and when I question him his ironical silence makes me fear all. Tell me what has happened."

I forgot my unhappiness, my love, and saw only her anxiety, and I did not hesitate to reveal the fatal conflict which she could not fail to learn hereafter. I lessened the wrongs put upon me, that she might not have occasion to blush for the name she bore.

"Struggle, struggle," said she, "avarice renders him capable of anything. Do not hesitate; defend your honor, save your life," and in the impetuosity of her indignation she siezed my hands. Her soft eyes flashed fire. I never saw her so beautiful.

"What does Granger say?" she continued.

"He hopes."

"Rely on his experience, write for him to come, I will meet him in one of our walks; it is necessary that I should speak with him."

I was obliged to affect perfect confidence in order to quiet her fears. Besides, how could I thenceforth doubt my success? Diana was with me. I could not be conquered.

We decided that I should not leave the chateau before the family council. Thanks to the subterfuge imagined by Granger, I did not declare open war against my guardian, since my demand for emancipation was explained by my desire to travel. A sudden rupture would have announced hostile views on my part, and changed my reasonable request into a formal accusation. Armed by a respite, we forgot our sorrows and by a tacit agreement the word separation was no longer mentioned.

Several interviews with Granger, at which my godmother begged me not to be present, so that he might speak freely, and of which she reported to me the smallest word, had enlightened me on the risks I was going to incur. Each day we conferred together, armed with a code, and discussed in advance the imaginary objections of my avaricious guardian. I was amazed at the rapidity and correctness of Diana's observations. She instinctively suggested arguments of which a lawyer need not have been ashamed.

One morning we received a note from my notary which gave me a rendezvous at a place in the forest.

"The family council will meet on Thursday," said he to us.

"Thursday," said Diana; "so soon!"

"We are not masters of the day, madam; the Justice of the Peace has jurisdiction."

"Do you think," continued she, "that all will be decided at one sitting?"

"I do not dare to hope it," replied the old lawyer, "for I am sure now that an objection which I have foreseen will be raised which will engage us in a long lawsuit. It is precisely to discuss this point that I had the honor of assembling you here to-day. Yesterday, I received a visit from the Count; he questioned me on the subject of our meeting. I believe he knows as much about it as I do. Anyway, it was merely a question of form, and my position obliged me to reply to him in order that he could prepare necessary documents. He made no remarks on his design; he knows that I will be his opponent in this dispute. Nevertheless, I have had sufficient experience with men to be able to understand at once that he will oppose your demand. Are you decided, Baron, to follow up this affair?"

"More than ever."

"It must be," said my godmother. "To cease now would betray fears which later would be taken advantage of."

"The Countess comprehends the danger perfectly," said the lawyer. "The affair once commenced, we shall have to continue it to the end, even if we have to bring it before the tribunal."

After a long discussion on our chances of success, we separated. It was decided that the pretext of my emancipation should be my departure for India with my cousin Clareney, and a project of a company for grubbing the grounds of the Punjaub, which voyage being supposed to last several years, necessitated an anticipated settlement of my affairs with my guardian.

Hardly an hour had passed after our return to Maufert when I saw Bastien coming towards me. I had pointed out this faithful fellow to Granger as a reliable intermedium in whom we could confide, and it was through him that all our correspondence passed, which it would not have done to give over to the doubtful discretion of the servants of the house. Bastien brought me these lines, written hastily with pencil on a leaf torn from a memorandum book:

"As I left the rocks I met an ugly little fellow about 15 years old, who looked like a goatherd from Maufert, and who seemed to be watching me. He followed me on the road as far as Thilay to find out my name at the inn, where I left my carriage. While they are harnessing, I send this by Bastien. Be on your guard, and remember that your proceedings are watched.—G."

"It must be that good-for-nothing boy, Lazarus, the son of old Letourneux the sorcerer," said Bastien. "I will run and watch their return. They are friends of Placide's."

Bastien was not deceived. It was Lazarus who followed the notary after his meeting with us in the forest. The smuggler had very little trouble in assuring himself of this. He promised to watch the boy; "I will have my eye on him," said he; "but be on your guard all the same."

How to Jump Safely from the Railroad Cars.—We often see persons make a bungling jump from cars while in motion, and often see them thrown down. This arises from a want of reflection, as they could jump safely, (if they only knew how,) though it is better and safer to wait till the cars stop than to run any risk. Now, there is a way that all persons should know, by which one can jump safely, even though the ears are going at great speed. Take care to have sure foothold when you are about to jump, then jump easily forward, at a little angle from the cars the same way they move, and continue your pace easily when you strike the earth, and you will not feel any more sensation than in an ordinary run. If the cars are at a very great speed, and necessity requires you to jump to save your life, then give all your vigor and strength, and jump with the ears, yet at a slight angle from them, and jump as high as possible in the air—the higher the better—for the body will soon lose its momentum and you will descend and light upon your feet without injury. This can be seen by sending an apple or a rocket into the air; when its strength upward is gone it falls to the ground in a direct line, so persons that jump in this way, without fear, are safe. Any other way is always dangerous to life.

SOMETHING ABOUT BANK-NOTES.

In a recent number of an English paper we find some interesting facts respecting the notes of the Bank of England. The paper on which the notes are printed is all made from the best rags by a single firm. It is made in sheets 16 inches long by 5 inches wide, on each of which two notes are to be printed. The sheets are then cut in two, when each note has three rough edges and one smooth one. The peculiar quality of the paper has been found the best protection against counterfeiting. The engraving of the notes has been imitated, but the paper never. Even the paper that was stolen a few months ago had to be sized by the thieves, and the work was so badly done that the counterfeits could be distinguished from the genuine by this defect alone.

A quantity of paper, enough for making 990,000 notes, is forwarded to London once a month; it is delivered to the bank-note paper office, where it is counted, and then handed to the printing office. After passing through a machine which prints all but the numbers, dates and signatures, it is returned to the paper office. In this transition state it is kept in store. As notes are required it is again passed through a machine for completion; each sheet is then cut in half, making two notes; the notes are counted and carefully examined by cashiers, whose duty it is to reject those which are indistinctly printed or are imperfect, tied up in bundles of 100 notes each, and five of these bundles in one, making a large bundle of 500 notes. The average daily manufacture is about 37,000 notes, or 74 bundles of 500 notes, each bundle weighing one and a half pounds. The number of notes made in a year will be over 11,500,000, the paper weighing more than 15 tons. Books are printed at the bank with a record of every note issued. Every note presented at the bank for payment is marked off these ledgers on the day following, the date of payment being stamped on the note and in the ledger. Should a forged note chance to be passed it would be detected the next day in posting the ledger.

About 37,000 notes are presented daily for payment. They are cancelled by tearing off the signature and punching, and then laid away in boxes, to be kept ten years. If reference to any of these notes is required, by furnishing the number, date and amount, it can be produced in ten minutes. Once a month the notes which have completed their ten years of rest are taken out and burnt.

Bank-notes are subject to many mishaps; they are buried, burned, drowned, washed to pieces and eaten.

Not many years since a laborer, in taking down a hedgerow came across a small box buried in the soil. Upon examining the contents they were found to be bank-notes, the proceeds of a robbery which had occurred so long previous as to be almost forgotten. It is supposed that the thieves, being hard pressed by officers of the law, hid the box where it was found, and were perhaps taken and hanged for some other crime, and so their secret died with them.

It is not an uncommon occurrence for notes to be thrown into the fire along with waste paper and burned. They are sometimes, too, used to light pipes, candles, gas, etc.

Notes have been blown into a river, and although the song has it:

> For a guinea it will sink,
> But a one pound note will float,

a five pound note will not.

Notes sometimes are left in pockets and washed into a complete wad. But the bank will redeem them, provided they remain so nearly legible that it is possible to identify them.

A story is told of a grazier who, having returned from market, was counting his money. The wind took one of the notes out of the window, and it was swallowed by a pet lamb. The animal was killed directly, and the note taken from its stomach and sent to London, with a statement of the circumstances. It was of course much discolored, but being all there, the grazier got his £20.

When a note is irrecoverably lost, the usual practice is—if the note be under £100—to make the loser wait five years, after which time application for payment will be entertained. But with notes of £100 and upwards, a sum equal to the amount lost is invested in consols, in the names of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England for twenty years. During this time, the dividends, as they accrue, are paid to the loser, and at the end of the term the stock is transferred into his name.

Divorce and Revenge among Birds.—The Shields (England) Gazette has the following curious story of animal life: "In the interior of the Tyne Dock wagon shops, the attention of the workmen was attracted to the movements of two sparrows, engaged in constructing a nest in the hollow where two girders met for the support of the iron roof. For several days they labored assiduously in preparing their abode, when, by some sudden freak, the progress of the tiny fabric was suspended. A few mornings afterwards the ears of the men were saluted by loud chirruping and fluttering of wings, and from what transpired subsequently it was evident that the female bird had severed the connubial knot, and enlisted the affections of another, who vigorously contended with the rejected bird for the possession of the nest. For several hours the conflict continued, until the usurper proved the strongest. The rejected bird shortly afterward returned and hovered about the spot, apparently watching an opportunity for revenge. This speedily occurred, for in the course of a short time the newly joined pair left for a brief period. In their absence, the defeated sparrow approached the nest, and, placing his back beneath the feathery mass, raised it from its resting place and sent it to the ground. The surprise of the other birds on their return, at beholding the demolition of their dwelling, appeared to be great, and was amusing to observe; notwithstanding this disaster, however they commenced to build a second nest, in the same place, the rejected mate watching their proceedings with apparent interest. After two days of incessant labor they again left for a short time, and, taking advantage of their absence, the disappointed bird again demolished their feathery residence.

Thorns.—There are many things that are thorns to our hopes until we have attained them, and envenomed arrows to our hearts when we have.

WHAT IS MY LOVE LIKE?

WHAT is my love like? She is fair—
Fair as a tender autumn star,
Twinkling through the woodland air.
A cloven cherry is her mouth,
Her breath a breeze that wanders far
Through camphire hills in the sweet South.

And fine, and delicate, and slim
Is her rich, purple-boddiced waist,
Set round with fringes, quaint and prim.
O'er her cool neck, a rosary
Of fragrant pearls, white-serried and chaste,
In one close-linked measure lie.

O wondrous, wondrous is her hair—
A twisted wealth of golden brown,
That droops above her temples bare.
A milky shoulder, gleaming shy,
Peeps coy and blanched above her gown,
As from a pleasant nunnery.

Her hand so oft doth kiss her lips,
That half the cherry blood has flown
In ruby to her finger tips.
I will not swear me for her eyes,
For, when we meet, my lids are prone—
Supine before their witcheries.

She hath a voice, like a low brook
That crystals through a bed of gold,
By saddest lilies sun-forsook.
And her sweet laugh is soft and slow,
And wise in meanings manifold—
A viol that the spring gusts blow.

Such is my love—a phantom bright,
The vision of a summer brain
Seen half between the dark and light.
She lives within a palace fine,
And sees the moons of fancy wane,
The image and the dream are mine.

"OUR TRIP TO WASHOE."

[BY THE "CALIFORNIAN'S" LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NUMBER FOUR—"PIGEON WING" VISITS THE MINES—IS FEASTED BY THE SUPERINTENDENTS AND TELLS ABOUT THE WASHOEITES.

I WAS awakened from my reverie to find myself standing upon a narrow platform suspended over the shaft of the Savage mine, grasping convulsively a very large rope, and doing my best to swallow a very large lump that kept constantly coming up into my throat in spite of all my efforts to keep it down.

The sensation of a sudden descent into the blackness and mystery of unknown depths, not knowing where you may land, nor when, nor how, is by no means pleasant—at all events I did not enjoy it, although others of the party declared that it was delightful. It seemed to me as if the bottom of my heart had suddenly dropped out—or as if I had found myself in deep water unprovided with fins, and without knowing how to swim, or high up in the air without wings. In short I found myself in a most unnatural and disagreeable position, and breathed a silent prayer of thankfulness when I found myself safely at the bottom of the shaft, more than 300 feet below the surface of the earth. Our descent had been accomplished so rapidly, that it was some moments before we could distinguish surrounding objects. At length we discovered that we were in the midst of subterranean passages running, it seemed to us, in many directions. Lights twinkled thickly amid the gloom, revealing many nooks and corners where busy workmen with picks and shovels were wresting the glittering treasures from the hard bosom of the reluctant earth. The temperature was pleasant, and the ventillation so perfect that there was an absence of all sultriness and closeness; we found it less difficult to breathe below the earth than above it. We explored galleries, descended ladders, and walked along dark passages, and looked down into shafts, and examined quartz veins and clay seams, and we saw a party of miners taking their lunch, and we wondered how they kept the course of time in a place where day and night are the same. Then we descended other ladders, narrower and longer and darker, until we thought that we should never get to the bottom, carrying candles in our hands all the while, like the seven wise virgins, and scalding ourselves with hot grease, and doing violence to our shins until finally we found ourselves in the famous Gould and Curry mine. It all looked alike to us, and we should never have known the difference between that and the Savage if we had not been told. There were endless beams and rafters overhead, and such vast galleries, long and narrow, upheld by framework, and so many timbers of all sorts and dimensions, that it looked more like a wood mine than a silver mine, and we felt as if we were walking over innumerable covered railroad bridges, or between the decks of some monster merchant ship. We expected to have found miners at work, but we were not prepared to see so many trades represented. There were carpenters and blacksmiths, and engineers and managers, and men who were pumping out the water, and others who were hoisting ore and still others who were running the cars and attending to dozens of things which we did not understand. It gradually dawned upon us that it was rather a difficult matter, and rather an expensive one to carry on a mine. We began to understand what became of the stockholders' investments, and what was wanted with assessments, and we finished our investigations with the wonder that any dividends were ever declared. Mines which only a few hours ago had seemed to our imaginations like great natural treasuries in which lucky stockholders had immense fortunes stored away, now looked like huge graves in which their money was buried forever from their view—vast bournes from whence no dividends could ever return. All around us lay great heaps of rich ore which workmen were breaking in pieces convenient for transportation. We could see the rich metal glittering through it, but we did not find it in bars or bricks, and we began to comprehend how hard it is to get hold of silver in any tangible shape, (we had already discovered how hard it is to keep hold of it,) and to feel a greater reverence for it than we had ever had before. We felt ourselves clutching the half-dollars in our pocket, with a sudden appreciation of their value.

The sensation produced by ascending a shaft is decidedly more pleasant than that accompanying the descent; and when I stood once more on the surface of the earth, and looked up at the blue sky and the broad expanse of earth and air, I mentally resolved that I would never willingly exchange them for any underground wonders again. Other members of our party pursued their investigations in various other mines, descending in buckets to wonderful depths, (which Mr. Lent spoke slightingly of as only a drop in the bucket,) going down inclines of dangerous steepness, and dropping on platforms with the quickness of thought. Of course their knowledge was greatly increased by their various experiences. They brought away with them a vast fund of information, a great many specimens of ore, and a wonderful conceit of themselves. They evidently thought that what they did not know about mining was not worth knowing. We lunched and dined that day with the Superintendent of the Gould and Curry, by whom we were most hospitably and elegantly entertained. We have never before seen an establishment presided over with so much grace and dignified elegance by a bachelor; but we could not help feeling all the while that it was a sort of rebuke on matrimony. What right has a bachelor to be so comfortable, and to have every thing so well ordered, without the assistance of a woman? Men have no right to demonstrate to the world the possibility of their getting along as well without a helpmate as with one. It is establishing a dangerous precedent. It will be a fatal thing for women, when men discover that they can do without them; from that moment will date their downfall from the altars whereon they are now enshrined as idols. And so, while we enjoyed our bachelor host's hospitality, we resented its elegance and ease as an insult to the gentle sex. After dinner we drove to the Gould and Curry mill. It was a lovely moonlight night, and the landscape lay before us distinct and clear as in the open day. The hills looked soft and billowy, and lights gleamed from a hundred little houses nestled among them. Sometimes they shone in clusters, sometimes they twinkled singly and alone; but we felt as we gazed at them that each one glowed upon the altar of home.

We went all through the mill, the Superintendent kindly explaining to our dull comprehension the whole process by which the broken, worthless-looking rock is transmuted into the enchanter's wand which has created a city in the midst of a desolation. If we had been previously astonished at the number and variety of trades necessary to the management of a mine, we were still more surprised when we saw the multitude of heads and hands which it requires to manage a mill. We kept thinking what a circumlocution office a silver mine is! We have never seen people spending their silver since that time without longing to tell them that if they only knew how much trouble it cost originally to make it they would hoard it up like misers, and never be spendthrifts again.

We wandered through all the mysteries of machinery, looking at everything with a silent, uncomprehending wonder. It seemed to us that they had in operation in that one mill every machine ever patented, except a sewing-machine; and I immediately recommended the purchase of one, to sew up their law-suit with the North Potosi.

In this gigantic establishment the work goes on by day and by night alike—the clang of the hammer, the whirr of the machinry, never ceases—the fires never die. As we stood on the embankment by the duck-pond, we turned and looked back upon the huge pile—the red fire-light gleamed athwart the landscape the lights shone from innumerable windows, the tall chimney puffed out its black volumes, thickening the moonlit air and casting dark shadows upon the hills, the thick, labored breathing of the engine filled the little valley with its hoarse, discordant sound, the red fires glowed with a lurid light, the men who fed them, as they opened the iron doors and raked out the ashes, looked like demons in Pandemonium, heaping red-hot coals upon the wicked—we instinctively thought of some great monster which could only be appeased by feeding it continually upon silver. We thought of the vacant chambers of the Gould and Curry mine, and in fancy we beheld their glittering contents poured into the devouring jaws of this fiery demon. It looked huge enough and wicked enough to swallow up, one by one, every mine in the Territory.

Virginia City is the most hospitable place I ever saw. We went there almost strangers, we took no letters of introduction, we expected no special courtesies: yet from the time of our arrival we were the recipients of the most cordial hospitalities, and of innumerable civilities which we can never forget. We were invited to dinners and lunches and pic-nics and parties, besides walks, drives and visits.

We were struck with the determined energy with which the ladies pursued their pleasures under difficulties. They think nothing of driving a dozen miles to a pic-nic, over rough roads, narrow and dangerous, in open carriages, with the wind blowing cold and sharp with a forty-San-Francisco power, and the dust flying through the air in fine impalpable alkaline powder, that covers everything with a gray ashen hue. We spent a charming day in a little valley on the Carson river. The ladies amused themselves in fishing, and rowing, and see-sawing. They sate idly chatting in the pleasant sunshine, or walking by the riverside until dinner was announced, and then the fun began. After the ladies were seated, it was suggested that the gentlemen should wait upon them. Never was a table more spleudidly served! Between every course the waiters took a drink. There was a flow of wine, and a flow of wit, a popping of corks and a cracking of jokes, that kept the table in a roar. Everybody was so jolly, and so grateful to the hospitable entertainer (another bachelor) for making them so, that they kept drinking his health, and calling him up to respond to their toasts, notwithstanding his blushes and his entreaties to be let alone. What a merry party it was!

But the drive home was fearful—everybody wanted to be first—or rather, nobody wanted to be last—and the horses were urged to the top of their speed, and we all went flying along the dusty road as if we were pursued by some mortal enemy or our houses were on fire at home. On another occasion, when we were about visiting Steamboat Springs, the snow began to fall; but the party went on all the same. One of the horses fell lame, another "interfered," and a third fainted on the very edge of a dangerous grade; but, nothing daunted, they kept on their course—they were in for fun, and they were bound to have it. After visiting the Geysers we drove half-a-dozen miles further to the beautiful valley of Washoe, green as an emerald set in an encircling ring of mountains—one of Nature's gems. What a contrast its green meadows and wooded hills and lovely little lake offered to the bare hills and sandy slopes of Virginia! It has its busy village, with stage-coaches, and wagons hauling ore to the mills, and the usual throng of idlers sauntering around the public places. There were comfortable homesteads at the foot of the hills overlooking the valley, and orchards, and fields of grain, and gardens, and fat cattle standing up to their sides in waving grass. Altogether, it looked a little Eden. We dined with the hospitable Superintendent, Mr. Palmer, and his charming family; and after walking through the famous Ophir mill, and seeing a great many things which in our ignorance we did not comprehend, we drove back in the clear moonlight.

A few nights afterwards, another large party of ladies and gentlemen thought it no hardship to drive a dozen miles to a ball at the Mexican mill, near Carson City, and, after dancing all night till broad daylight, to drive back again in the morning. We can safely say of our friends in Virginia City that the ladies can stand more fun and the gentlemen more champagne than any other people we ever knew. In their kindness and unsuspecting frankness they reminded us of the early society of San Francisco, before Mrs. Grundy came here to live, and made all her neighbors miserable.

It was with a feeling of sincere regret that we took our last look of Virginia by the early light of 4 o'clock on a Friday morning. It had a dissipated, slovenly look, as if it had sat up too late the night before, and had not yet been to the barber's. The streets were unswept, the sidewalks untidy, and, altogether, it looked as if it had been made in a hurry of such materials as were at hand, and had to be used before it was finished. Nevertheless, it is a wonderful place, and is destined perhaps for a great history.

We chose a new route home, through the Henness Pass. For miles after leaving Virginia it is barren and desolate; but still we began to see signs of other vegetation besides the everlasting sage brush. Spikes of wild mignonette thrust themselves up between clusters of a dwarf azalia—very poor and forlorn, it is true, but still it showed that Nature was at work within the soil. On beds of utterly-barren sand the warmth-loving portulacca spread its tender fibres, its delicate pink blossoms literally making the desert blossom as the rose. We passed through the broad meadows of the Truckee river, where Nature has spread out her green apron and filled it full of buttercups and daisies; and we drove through groves of magnificent trees, which narrowly escaped being giants worthy of Calaveras and Mariposa. How it grieved us to see the prostrate monarch, dethroned and crownless, cut down in the mere wantonness of destruction, and left to decay in silence and uselessness—all the honors with which centuries had crowned them withered by one stroke of some Vandal ax. Truckee Lake is a pretty little sheet of water, but after Lake Bigler it disappointed us.

We passed through several little mining towns, and saw several others at a distance; and we remember the seamed and scarred faces of the hills around them, wounded by a hydraulic something, (I forget what,) in which the very brooks and fountains which they had nourished in their bosoms were turned against them to rob and deform them. It was a new form of ingratitude. And we saw the great flume—the father of all flumes—high enough to have conveyed water to the Tower of Babel; and we saw the Yuba. We must not forget the Yuba, for the ascent of its mountain affords a great many glimpses of wild scenery, picturesque and not unmixed with sublimity. Looking down into the narrow ravine, with the river rushing madly through it, we saw the tops of tall trees waving far below us on the precipitous sides. We saw, what interested us far more, a simple white flower, the wild syringa, a native of the South. We had never seen it before on the Pacific Coast—and it bore us far away on its white wings to friends and home, by the banks of our native river. We found the roads narrower and rougher than by the Pincerville route; and the journey fatigued us far more. We were delighted when, at 5 o'clock in the evening, we reached the pretty little mountain village of Nevada, and the charming new hotel of Mr. Ira Eaton. How cool and clean and fresh every thing appeared after our dusty drive! How soft the beds were; how easy the chairs! A little river ran through the town, making it musical. Orchards surrounded villa-like houses, and roses and honeysuckles embowered them. We slept as sweetly in our spring beds that night as the bees did in the flowers, and arose quite as early. After a delicious breakfast we took our places for our last day's journey in the coach, and started for the terminus of the railroad. When we went to Virginia we thought we made extraordinary speed, but it was nothing to our drive from Nevada to Newcastle. Our driver gave whip and reins to our six fresh horses, and in the cool morning air and over a smooth road we fairly flew. We passed through Grass Valley, a pretty straggling little village, famous for having been at one time the centre of an immensely rich mining district, and for (what interested us more) having been the residence of Lola Montez. What a train of thought the sight of that little cottage awakened! I wonder what her thoughts used to be, when she stood at her threshold and looked over the wild, strange scenes that surrounded her—she who had been the favorite of a monarch, the inmate of a palace, the centre of a brilliant court, the ruling power of a kingdom. What solace did she find in this solitude for all that she had left behind her—what was the charm that drew her hither while still in the prime of womanhood, still brilliant, still beautiful. After a life of so much adventure, so much eclat, so much folly, and so much sin, to fold her wings in such an eyrie as this at last! I wondered how she spent the long summer days and the long winter nights. Did she never see in her dreams the fair city of Munich, with its palaces, and galleries and works of art, and parks and fountains, where she once reigned an uncrowned queen—and did she never recall in her visions a certain chamber of beauties in the royal palace, and the vacant panel, where her own sweet face once smiled upon a kingly adorer! And then I thought of her death-bed, when poor and penitent she laid down to die in a foreign land, and strange hands closed those beauteous eyes through which a great but lost soul had flashed out its signal fires of distress amid the pauses of that wild storm of passion by which it was tossed, and wrecked at last.

THE ORIGIN OF LYNCH LAW.

LYNCH Law, as Californians and residents of other remote States well know, is a very summary method of bringing culprits to justice, and those among our earlier pioneers who were disposed to be dishonest were held in wholesome restraint by the fear of "Judge Lynch." Some who will read this may possibly have made his personal acquaintance, but we think there are few who are posted in regard to who he originally was or whence he came. These we propose to enlighten by the following quotation:

In an essay on the English language in America, Charles A. Bristed says: "If there was ever a phrase deemed particularly transatlantic in origin, it is that of Lynch law, for summary and informal justice; yet there appear good reasons for doubting its western paternity. It is usually explained as having been derived from the emphatic practice of a certain Judge Lynch who lived somewhere in the 'far West.' But no authentic or consistent account of this functionary exists; no tangible grounds for supposing him to be anything more than a mythical personage, while a very probable solution of the phrase presents itself in the parent tongue. Linch, in several of the northern county dialects, means to beat or maltreat. Lynch law, then, would be simply equivalent to club law, and the change of a letter may be easily accounted for by the fact that the name of Lynch is as common in some parts of America as in Ireland."

Says "Claverhouse," Mr. Bristed's theory is very ingenious, but it is not correct. In America, the term "Lynch law" was first used in Piedmont, on the western frontier of Virginia. There was no Court within the district, and controversies were referred to the arbitrament of prominent citizens. Among these was a man by the name of Lynch, whose decisions were so impartial that he was known as Judge Lynch, and the system was called "Lynch law," and was adopted in our pioneer settlements as an inexpensive and speedy way of obtaining justice.

Long after the death of the good old Judge, when the manners and customs had changed, and wicked men usurped the prerogatives of the Courts and set the laws at defiance "Lynch law" came to be regarded as a reproach. The system has of course passed into disuse in Virginia, and is only revived occasionally in California or on our western borders.

The origin of the expression, however, is British, and dates from the early part of the fifteenth century.

Prince Puckler Muskau, in his Tour in England, etc., gives the following account of the tragedy from which it derives its name:

In the fifteenth century James Lynch was chosen Mayor of Galway for life, an office then nearly equal to that of the sovereign in power and influence. His son Edward became attached to Anna Blake, the daughter of his best friend, but found it difficult to interest her. During the courtship, Mr. Lynch went on a journey to Cadiz and brought back with him the son of a wealthy Spanish merchant named Gomez. The young Gomez married the daughter of Mr. Lynch and became very intimate with his brother-in-law, Edward.

The latter, however, suspected that he was carrying on an intrigue with Anna Blake, and one night, having concealed himself behind a pillar, he saw young Gomez, wrapped in a mantle, glide with hurried steps out of a side door in the house of Anna's father, which led immediately to her apartment. As the horrible certainty flashed upon him, he darted like a tiger upon his rival, and buried his dagger a hundred times in his quivering body. He then fled to the woods. On the morrow he was found, and confessed his guilt.

His father condemned him to death. The people interposed and demanded his release. Even the soldiers went over to the mob and cried aloud for his pardon. The prison was about to be stormed, when James Lynch appeared at an upper window, his son standing by his side with a halter round his neck. "I have sworn," said the inflexible magistrate, "that the murderer should die, even though I must perform the office of executioner myself. Providence has taken me at my word; and you, madmen, learn from the most wretched of fathers that nothing must stop the course of justice, and that even the ties of nature must break before it."

As he said these words, he pushed his son out of the window, and completed the dreadful work. Nor did he leave the spot till the last convulsive struggles gave certainty of the death of his unhappy victim.

The Mayor resigned all his dignities, and never left his house till carried from it to the grave. Anna Blake is said to have died in a convent, and the rumor goes that both families disappeared from the earth, but a skull and cross-bones sculptured over the door of an ancient house in Galway still marks the site of this fearful tragedy.

A WOMAN-HUSBAND.—In 1733, a woman went courting a woman, dressed as a man, and was very favorably received. The lady to whom these not very delicate attentions were paid, was much older than the lover; but she was possessed of about a hundred pounds; and this was the attraction to her adventurous friend. But the intended treachery was discovered; and, as the original chronicler of the story says, "the old lady proved too knowing." A more extraordinary case than this was that of two women who lived together by mutual consent as man and wife for six-and-thirty years. They kept a public house at Poplar; and the "wife," when on her death-bed, for the first time told her relatives the fact concerning her marriage. The writer in the Gentleman's Magazine, (1776,) who records the circumstances, states that "both had been crossed in love when young, and had chosen this method to avoid further importunities." It seems, however, that the truth was suspected; for the "husband" subsequently charged a man with extorting money from her under the threat of disclosing the secret, and for this offence he was sentenced to stand three times in the pillory, and to undergo four years' imprisonment.

TAN-TAMOUNT TO FAME.—A celebrated Cambridge scholar an admirer of the Greek poets, has ordered in his will, that after death his body shall be dissected, and his skin taken off and tanned in such a manner as to convert it into a parchment, on which the Iliad of Homer shall then be copied, the singular MS. to be deposited in the British Museum!

SECTION II.

1. Memorandum of Mr. Henderson.

WE now come to that portion of Mrs. Anderton's history which embraces the period between her marriage and the commencement of her last illness. For this I have been compelled to have recourse to various quarters. The information thus afforded is very complete, and taken in conjunction with what we have already seen in Miss B——'s correspondence of the previous life of this unfortunate lady, throws considerable light upon two important points to be hereafter noticed. The depositions, however, unavoidably run to a greater length than at this stage of the proceedings, their bearing on the main points of the case would render necessary, and I have therefore condensed them for your use in the following memorandum. Any portion, not sufficiently clear, may be elucidated by a reference to the originals enclosed.

Mr. Anderton was a gentleman of good origin, closely connected with some of the first families in Yorkshire, where he had formed the acquaintance of Miss Boleton, while staying at the house of her great aunt, Miss B——. He appears to have been of a most gentle and amiable disposition, though unfortunately so shy and retiring as to have formed comparatively very few intimacies. All, however, who could be numbered among his acquaintances seem to have been equally astonished at the charge brought against him on the death of his wife, with whom he was always supposed, though from his retired habits little was positively known, to have lived upon terms of the most perfect felicity. As the event proved, the case would in effect never have come on for trial; but, had it done so, the defence would have brought forward overwhelming evidence of the incredibility of such a crime on the part of one of so gentle and affectionate a disposition.

During the four years and a half of their married life there does not appear to have been a cloud upon their happiness. Mrs. Anderton's letters to her great aunt, Miss B——, (to whom I am indebted for almost the whole of the important information I have been able to collect respecting the family,) are full of expressions of attachment to her husband and instances of his devotion to her. Copies of several of these letters are enclosed, and from these it will be seen how unvarying was their attachment to each other. Throughout the entire series, extending over the whole period of her married life, there is not a single expression which could lead to any other conclusion.

It is, however, evident that the delicate health with which Mrs. Anderton had been afflicted from her birth, still continued, and in two instances we have indications of the same mysterious attacks noticed in the letter of Mrs. Vansittart, before quoted. These, however, appear to have been but very slight. They had for some years been of more and more rare occurrence, and from this date, (October, 1852,) we have no further record of anything of the kind. Still Mrs. Anderton's general health continued very unsatisfactory, and almost everything seems to have been tried by her for its improvement. Among the enclosed correspondence are letters dated from Baden, Ems, Lucca, Cairo, and other places to which the Andertons had, at different times, gone for the health of one or other, Mr. Anderton being also, as stated in Mrs. Ward's letter of the 14th June, 1851, extremely delicate.

Of this gentleman all accounts agree in stating that the chief ailment was a constitutional nervousness, mental as well as physical. The latter showed itself in the facility with which, though by no means deficient in courage, he could be startled by any sudden occurrence however simple; the former, in his extreme sensitiveness to the opinions of those about him, and his dread of the slightest shadow of reproach on the name of which he was so justly proud. In the accompanying documents you will find instances of both these idiosyncrasies.

In the summer of 1854 Mr. Anderton's attention seems to have been drawn to the subject of mesmerism. They had been spending some weeks at Malvern, where this science seems particularly in vogue, and had there made acquaintance with several of the patients at the different water-cure establishments, by some of whom Mr. Anderton was strongly urged to have recourse to mesmeric treatment both for Mrs. Anderton and himself.

The constant solicitations of these enthusiastic friends seem at length to have produced their effect, and the favorite operator of the neighborhood was requested to try his skill on these new patients. On Mr. Anderton the only result seems to have been the inducing of such a state of irritation as might not unreasonably have been expected from so nervously excitable a temperament, in presence of the "manipulations" to which the votaries of mesmerism are subjected. In the case of Mrs. Anderton, however, the result was, or was supposed to be, different. Whether from some natural cause that, at the time, escaped attention, or whether solely from that force of imagination from which such surprising results are often found to arise, I cannot of course say; but it is certain that some short time after the mesmeric séances had commenced, a decided though slight improvement was perceptible. This continued until the departure of the operator for Germany, which country he had only recently left on a short visit to England.

Notwithstanding the worse than failure in his own case, the certainly curious coincidence of his wife's recovery seems to have entirely imposed on Mr. Anderton, whose susceptibility of disposition appears indeed to have laid him especially open to the practices of quacks of every kind. So great was now his faith in this new remedy that he actually proposed to accompany the Professor to Germany rather than that his wife should lose the benefit of the accustomed "manipulations." He had proceeded to London, for the purpose of making the necessary preparations, when he was induced to pause by the remonstrances of several of his friends, who represented to him that a winter in the severe climate of Dresden—the place to which the Professor was bound—would probably be fatal to [illegible] of Mrs. Anderton's delicate constitution.

[illegible] medical adviser also, though himself professing belief in [illegible]ation, gave a similar opinion, while at the same time he [illegible] difficulty respecting the mesmeric treatment of [illegible]derton, by offering an introduction to "one of the [illegible]erful mesmerists in Europe," who had recently [illegible] London, and who eventually proved to be the so-[illegible]erton R.

This introduction appears to have finally decided Mr. Anderton against the Dresden expedition; and, after a brief experience of his manipulations, Mrs. Anderton herself seems to have derived, in imagination at least, more benefit from them than even from those of her late attendant. So thoroughly were they both impressed with the beneficial results of the Baron's "passes," etc., that Mr. Anderton, who had now resolved to settle in London for the autumn and winter, went so far as to take a ready furnished house at Notting Hill, for the express purpose of having his new professor in his immediate neighborhood. Here séances were continued often twice or three times a day, and though, of course, no one in his senses could really attribute such a result to the exercises of the Baron, it is certain that, from some cause or other, the health of Mrs. Anderton continued steadily to improve.

Matters had continued in this position for some weeks, when objections were raised by some of Mr. Anderton's relations to what they not unnaturally considered the very questionable propriety of the proceeding. There seems to have been a good deal of discussion on this point in which, however, Mr. Anderton's constitutional susceptibility finally carried the day against his newly conceived predilections with respect to a practice so obviously calculated to expose him to unpleasant comment. The Baron, however, was not disposed so easily to relinquish a patient from whom he derived such large and regular profits. On being made acquainted with the decision respecting the cessation of his visits, he at once declared that his own direct manipulations were unnecessary, and that, if considered improper for one of the opposite sex, they could easily be made available at second-hand.

Having once swallowed the original imposition, any additional absurdity was of course easily disposed of, and it was now determined to avoid all occasion for offence; Mrs. Anderton should henceforth be operated upon through the medium of a certain Mlle. Rosalie, a clairvoyante in the employment of the Baron, who, after being placed "en rapport" with the patient, was to convey to her the benefit of the manipulations to which she was herself subjected by the operator.

Into the precise modus operandi I need not now enter, but will only remark upon the fresh instance of the extraordinary powers of imagination displayed in the still more rapid improvement of Mrs. Anderton under this new form of treatment, and the marvellous "sympathy" so rapidly induced between her and the Baron's "medium."

Mlle. Rosalie was a brunette rather below the medium height, with a slight but beautifully proportioned and active figure, sallow complexion, and dark hair and eyes. The only fault a connoisseur would probably find with her person would be the extreme breadth of her feet, though this perhaps might be accounted for by her former occupation, to be noticed later on. It is necessary for our purpose that this peculiarity should be kept in mind. In appearance she was at that time about thirty years old, but might very possible have been younger, as the nature of her profession would probably entail a prematnre appearance of age. Altogether she formed a remarkable contrast to Mrs. Anderton, who was slight but tall, and very fair, with remarkably small feet, and notwithstanding her ill-health still looking a year or two less than her age. Between these very different persons, however, if we are to credit the enclosed letters, such a "sympathy" sprang up as would, on all ordinary hypothesis, be perfectly unaccountable. Mrs. Anderton could feel—or imagined that she felt—the approach of Mlle. Rosalie even before she entered the room; the mere touch of her hand seemed to afford immediate benefit, and within a few weeks she became perfectly convalescent, and stronger than she had ever been before.

At this point I must again refer you to the depositions themselves, that of Mr. Morton, which here follows, being of too much importance to admit of condensation.

2. Statement of Frederick Morton, Esq., late Lieutenant, R. A.

My name is Frederick George Morton. In 1854, I was a lieutenant in the Royal Artillery and was slightly wounded at the battle of Inkermann, on the 5th of November of that year, the day after my arrival in the Crimea. It was before joining the battery to which I was appointed. I have since quitted the service, on the death of my father, and am now residing with my mother at Leeds. I was an old school friend of the late Mr. William Anderton, and knew him intimately for nearly fifteen years. I was present at his marriage with Miss Boleton in August, 1851, and have since frequently visited at their house. During the time I was at Woolwich Academy, I spent every leave-out day with them, and frequently a good portion of the vacations. My father encouraged the intimacy, and I was as much at home in their house as in our own. My father was junior partner in one of the large manufacturing firms in Leeds. The Andertons generally lived in London, when they were not abroad; and on one occasion I went with them to Wiesbaden. I saw very little of them in 1854, as they were away the earlier part of the year, first at Ilfracombe and then at Malvern, but I spent the 13th of October with them. I particularly remember the date, as I was on my way to the Crimea, where I was afterwards wounded, and the order had come very suddenly. When it came I had just gone to a friend's house for some pheasant-shooting, and I remember I was obliged to leave the second morning, and I spent the night at Anderton's and embarked the next morning. I was to have gone for the first, but could not get away, and I lost the shooting altogether. It was on a Saturday that I embarked, because I remember we had church parade next day. That was the last time I saw Andertou. I was in Italy all that winter with my wound and rheumatic fever; and in the summer of 1855 I was sent for by my father, who was ill for several months before he died, and after that I could not leave my mother. We only took in a weekly paper, and I did not hear of his having been taken up till three or four days after. I started to see him directly but was too late. It was not on account of any quarrel that we had not met. Quite the reverse. We were as good friends as ever to the last, and I would have given my life to serve him. I was on the most friendly terms with Mrs. Anderton. He was dotingly fond of her. I used to laugh and say I was jealous of her, and they used to laugh too. I never saw two people so fond of one another. He was the best and kindest-hearted fellow I ever knew, only awfully nervons, and very sensitive about his family and his name. The only time we ever quarrelled was once at school, when I tried to chaff him by pretending to doubt something he had said: it made him quite ill. He often said he would rather die than have any stain upon his name, which he was very proud of. On the day I speak of—13th October, 1854—I telegraphed to them that I would dine and sleep there on my way out. I found Mrs. Anderton better than I had ever seen her before. She said it was all Baron R's doing, and that since Rosalie came she had got well faster than ever. She wanted to put off the Baron for that night, that we might have a quiet talk, but I would not let her; and besides, I wanted to see him and Rosalie. They came at about 9 o'clock, and Mrs. Anderton lay on the sofa, and Rosalie sat on a chair by her side, and held her hand while the Baron sent her to sleep. It was Rosalie he put to sleep, not Mrs. Anderton. The latter did not go to sleep, but lay quite still on the sofa, while Anderton and I sat together at the farther end of the room, because he said we might "cross the mesmeric fluid." I don't know what he meant. Of course I know that it was all nonsense; but I don't think Rosalie was shamming. I should go to sleep myself, if a man went on that way. When it was over, Mrs. Anderton said she felt much better, and I couldn't help laughing; then Anderton sent her up to bed, and he and I and the Baron sat talking for an hour and more. I never saw Mrs. Anderton again, for I went away before she was up, but I used to hear of her from Anderton. What we talked of after she was gone was mesmerism. Of course I did not believe in it, and Anderton and the Baron tried to persuade me it was true. We were smoking, but Rosalie was there and said she did not mind it. She always seemed to say whatever the Baron wanted, but I don't think she liked him. She did not join in the conversation. She said—or at least the Baron said—she could not speak English, but I am quite sure she must have understood it, or at all events a good deal. I have learned German and sometimes I said something to her, and she answered; and once I saw her look up so quickly when Anderton said something about "Julie," and the Baron said directly, in German, "not your Julie, child." I asked her, as she was going away, who Julie was, and she had just told me she was her great friend, and a dancing girl, when the Baron gave her a look, and she stopped. That was as they were leaving. Before that, Rosalie was doing crotchet, and we three were talking about mesmerism. They tried to make me believe it, and the Baron was telling all sorts of stories about a wonderful clairvoyante. That was his Julie, not Rosalie's. Of course I laughed at it all, and then they got talking about sympathies, and what a wonderful sympathy there was between twins, and the Baron told some more extraordinary stories. And when I wouldn't believe it Anderton got quite vexed, and reminded me about the twin sister his wife had had, and who had been stolen by gypsies. And then the Baron asked him about it, and he told him the whole story, only making him promise not to tell it again, because they were afraid of her being reminded of it, and that was why it was never spoken of. The Baron seemed quite interested, and drew his chair close in between us. We were speaking low, that Rosalie might not hear. I remember the Baron said it was so curious he must take a note of it, and he wrote it all down in his pocket-book. He took down the dates, and all about it. He was very particular about the dates. I am sure Rosalie could have heard nothing of all this; not even if she had understood English. We had gone to the window, and were too far off. Besides we spoke low. Afterwards the Baron seemed thoughtful, and did not speak for some time. Anderton and I got to mesmerism again, and he got a number of some magazine—the Zoist, or something of that sort—to prove to me something. He read me some wonderful story about eating by deputy, and when I would not believe it, he called the Baron and asked if it was not true, and he said perfectly, he had known it himself. He started when Anderton spoke to him, as if he had been thinking of something else, and he had to repeat it again. I know it was something about eating by deputy, because afterwards, when I was wounded and had the fever, I used to think of it and wish I could take physic that way. You will find it in the Zoist for that month—October, 1854.* I remember saying at the time that it was lucky for the young woman that the fellow didn't eat anything unwholesome, and Anderton laughed at it. The Baron did not laugh. He stood for ever so long without saying a word, and looking quite odd. I thought that I had offended him by laughing. Anderton spoke to him, and he jumped again, and I saw this time he had let his cigar ont. I remember that, because he tried to light it again by mine, and his hand shook so he put mine out instead. He said he was cold, and shut the window. He would not have another cigar, but said he must go away for it was late. Anderton and I sat smoking for some time. I tried to persuade him to give up mesmerism, and he said Mrs. Anderton was so well now he thought she could do without it, and that she would give it up in a few weeks. I heard from him afterwards, in November, that the Baron had left town for some weeks. When I was ill at Scutari, after my wound, I wrote to ask him to meet me at Naples, and he started with Mrs. Anderton in December, but was stopped at Dover by Mrs. Anderton's illness. I have had several letters from him since, and am quite ready to give copies of them; all but the bits that are private. I have read over this statement, and it is all quite true. I am quite ready to swear to it in a court of justice, if required. I wish to add that I am quite certain poor Anderton had nothing to do with his poor wife's death. I will swear to that.

Statement of Julie.

"MANCHESTER, August 3d, 1857.

"DEAR SIR.—In compliance with your instructions of the 11th ult., I forward deposition of Julia Clark, alias Julie, alias Miss Montgomery, &c., at present of the Theatre Royal, duly attested. "Dear sir, yours faithfully,

"WILLIAM SMITH."

"I am a dancer, and my name is Julia Clark: I have performed under the name of Julie, and other names. I am at present called Miss Montgomery. I knew the girl called Rosalie. She was my particular friend. We were for several years together in Signor Leopoldo's company. I forget how many. She did the tight-rope business, and had ten shillings a week and her keep. In our company she was called the 'Little Wonder.' Her real name was Charlotte Brown. She was about ten years old when I joined the company. I don't know her history. She did not know it herself. She often told me so. She would have told me if she did. She passed as the niece of old Mrs. Brown. Mrs. Brown was the money-taker. She took Lotty's money and found her in clothes. Lotty is Rosalie. Some of our ladies said she had been bought from a tramp. Of course I did not believe it. They said it out of spite. Lotty did the tight-rope business for about five years after I knew her. She was a beautiful figure, only her feet were very broad. All tight-rope dancers are.

*An extract from the magazine here quoted will be given later on in the case.

The rope spreads them. Otherwise her figure was perfect. She was not very nervous, but rather. She used to tremble before she went on. It was not from fear. She was ill sometimes. But not often. Sometimes she caught cold from sitting on the damp ground to undress when she was hot with dancing. She got stronger as she grew up. Sometimes she felt ill, and did not know why. She had bad headaches. When she was in that way physic was no good, only brandy. Brandy took away the headaches. She used to drink brandy sometimes, but not like some of our ladies. I never saw her the worse for liquor. Her headaches were not from drinking. Certainly not. They came and went away again. Brandy took them away. I only know of once that she has been ill since she left the company. She wrote and told me of it. I have the letter still. It is not dated, but there was an extract from a newspaper about her which is dated some time in October, 1852. The day of the month is cut off. She gave up the tight-rope business because of a fall. That was from being nervous. She was not drunk. She had not been drinking. She was nervous. A glass drop fell from the chandelier and frightened her. That was all. She was very much hurt. One foot was sprained, and the doctors at the hospital said she must never go on the wire again. She was two months there. When she came out the circus was shut up. The company was all dispersed except her and me and Rogers and the gentleman who did the comic business. Mr. Rogers was the Signor Leopoldo. He took a music-hall. I think it was in Liverpool. He got another singing lady and gentleman, and we gave entertainments. Every evening Rogers gave a short lecture on mesmerism, and Lotty was his subject. She was very clever at that. Of course she was not really asleep. One night she stopped in the middle. The manager was very angry. She tried to go on, but she fainted and had to be carried off. She said some gentleman in the stalls had done it. Next morning the gentleman called and took her away. He gave the Signor 50*l*. He was the Baron R. I knew it from Lotty. She has written to me several times. These are her letters. They are rubbed at the edges. It is from keeping them in my pocket. I do not think she ever left the Baron, but I do not know. The last letter I ever had from her was from his house. It was in the first week of November, 1854. I got it in Plymouth. It was the only week I was there before I went to Dublin for the pantomime. She said she was going to be married, but must not tell me who to just yet. I never heard from her since. I have written several times, but my letters have been returned. I have no idea who she married. It could not have been the Baron. She disliked him too much. She stayed with him because he paid her well. Partly that, and partly because she said she couldn't help doing what he told her. She said he really did mesmerise her, and that she could see in her sleep. She did not live with the Baron as his wife. Only as his medium. If she had she would have told me. I am quite sure she would. I am quite certain there never was any connection between her and the Baron except what I have said. Of course I cannot swear she did not marry him, but I should think it very unlikely. Why should she when she disliked him so much? All this is true. I believe Signor Leopoldo is now somewhere abroad.

4. Statement of Leopoldo.

N. B.—This statement was obtained with some difficulty, and only on an express promise of immunity from any legal procceding, in respect of the deponent's relations with the girl Rosalie, alias Angelina Fitz Eustace, alias the "Little Wonder," alias Charlotte Brown. The statement was enclosed in the following note:

"Signor Leopoldo, tragedian, etc., etc., etc., presents his compliments to R. Henderson, Esq., and in consideration of the assurance that 'what is done cannot be now amended,' I have the honor to forward the required information, in confidence that you will not keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope, and thus 'my simple truth shall be abused.' "Sir, your most humble servant,

(Signed) "THOMAS ROGERS."

Deposition of Signor Leopoldo, Tragedian; Professor of Fencing and Elocution; Equestrian, Gymnastic, and Funambulistic Artiste; Sole Proprietor and Manager of the Great Olympian Circus, etc., etc., etc.

"I, Signor Leopoldo, tragedian, etc., etc., etc., do hereby depose and declare that the girl, Charlotte Brown, commonly known as the celebrated 'Little Wonder,' was transferred by me to my celebrated Olympian Company in the month of July, 1837, at Lewes, in the county of Sussex, where the celebrated Olympian Circus was at that time performing with great success and crowded houses. And this deponent further maketh oath and saith that I, the said Signor Leopoldo, tragedian, etc., etc., etc., did in consideration of the services of the said Charlotte Brown, commonly known as the celebrated 'Little Wonder,' pay to a certain person or persons claiming to be the parent or parents of the said Charlotte Brown, commonly known as the celebrated 'Little Wonder,' the sum of five pounds, (£5,) which person or persons were of the tribe or tribes commonly known as gypsies or Egyptians. And this deponent furthermore maketh oath and saith that I, Signor Leopoldo, tragedian, etc., etc., etc., cannot tell whether the said Charlotte Brown, commonly known as the 'Little Wonder,' was really the child of the person or persons, gypsy or gypsies aforesaid, or that her name was Charlotte Brown, or any other of the particulars hereinbefore stated and deposed, but only that her linen was marked 'C. B.,' which initials do set forth and represent the name of Charlotte Brown.

"Witness our hand and seal this 4th day of January, in the year of grace, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight.

(Signed) "THOMAS ROGERS."

5. Statement of Edward Morris, Clerk in the Will Office. Doctors' Commons.

"My name is Edward Morris. I am a clerk in the Will Office at Doctors' Commons, and my duty is to assist those who wish to search wills deposited in our office. On the 14th October, 1854, Baron R. came to the office and searched in several wills. One was the will of a Mr. Wilson, copy of which is herewith enclosed. I remember this will particularly, because I had an altercation with the Baron respecting his wish to copy parts of it. He wished to make extracts, and I told him it was not allowed; only the date and the names of the executors. He persisted, and I said I must report it. He then laughed and said it did not matter, and he tapped his forehead and said he could make a note of it there. He read parts of the will over two or three times and gave it back to me. He then said: 'You shall see, my friend,' and laughed again, and he made me follow him while he repeated several pages of the will by rote. He laughed again when he had done, and asked if he might copy it now. I said no; and he laughed again, and wrote for some time in his note-book, looking up at me every now and then and laughing. I was angry, partly because he laughed, and partly because he kept me there when I wanted to get away. I had leave for a week to go to the Isle of Wight and see my aunt. I wanted to get there that night because the next day was my birthday. He made me miss the train, and as the next day was Sunday, I did not get there till late. That is how I remember the date. I am sure of the year because my aunt only went to the Isle of Wight the November previously, and died in the spring of 1855. I am quite sure it was the Baron. I should recognize him anywhere. He is a short, stout man, with a rather florid complexion and reddish hair, rather light. He has large fat hands, white and well kept, and an immense head. He dresses all in black, and wears large spectacles of light blue. I don't think it is because his eyes are weak. I am sure it is not; for when he takes off his spectacles I never saw such extraordinary eyes. I can't describe them, only that they are very large and bright. I never could look at them long enough to make out the color, but they are very dark, I think black, and they put one out to look at them, otherwise there is nothing very remarkable about him. I recognized him that day from having seen him before at a mesmeric lecture, when I asked his name.

6. Memorandum by Mr. Henderson.

I enclose the will, of which the following is an abstract:

"Mr. Wilson, of the firm of Price & Wilson, Calcutta, who died in 1825, leaves the sum of £25,375 three per cent. consols, to his niece, Gertrude Wilson, (afterwards Lady Boleton,) and to her children, if any, or their heirs in regular succession, whether male or female. In default of any such heirs, the money to be made over to trustees selected by the Governor General of India for the time being, from among the leading merchants of Calcutta, for the purpose of founding, under certain restrictions, an institution among the hills for the children of those who could not afford to send them home to England.

The will also provides that should any female taking under it die during her coverture, the husband shall retain a life interest in the property.

OUR POPULAR SUPERSTITIONS.

IT is long since Sir Thomas Brown penned his erudite treatise on "Vulgar Errors," but the subject is not yet exhausted. Notwithstanding we Americans have cut loose from the scenes that bind to darker eras, own no traditions, and may be said to take as our motto that of the conqueror of Mexico:

"Adelante, mi sobrino, Y no creo en agueros,"

there still lurks many a reminiscence of mediæval superstition among us, especially in the lower strata of our social life. We have thought it worth the pains to collect some of these, and we wish to state at the outset that we shall speak only of those that have come to our personal knowledge in some section of our own country.

In certain parts of the South one hears marvellous tales of a fabulous monster known as the hoop-snake, which is armed with a horn on its head the length of one's finger, and derives its name from its original and convenient method of locomotion, which is by taking its tail in its mouth, stiffening its body, and revolving like a wheel or hoop. It is said to be of venom so concentrated that when it strikes its poisonous horn into a tree, the tree straightway withers and dies. This myth, which we have heard told with full credence by natives of Maryland, belongs alike to Grecian, to Roman, and to Indian mythology, and is supposed in these to be symbolical of the lightning, or fire-snake, and may be a remnant of the dark traditions of the Obi worship. The fact is, we have not forgotten that the devil once entered a serpent's skin to deceive our grandmother, and cherish a hope that we may sometime catch him again in his favorite disguise. Once in a while, his gloomy majesty also appears as a black dog, which neither barks nor bites, but whose touch induces an incurable palsy. This was his favorite shape while wandering up and down and to and fro in the middle ages, as witness the famous poodles of Dr. Faustus and Cornelius Agrippa. This notion is a relic of the paganism of ancient Rome, and sprang from the sacrifice of dogs to Hecate, but we have heard it in our young days narrated with the freshness of novelty and implicit faith in the interior of Pennsylvania. It is from the deeply-rooted belief that such animals were the peculiar instruments of Satan, that we are to explain a curious law, in operation in Saxony down to a quite recent date, by which criminals convicted of certain heinous and unnatural crimes were sewed in a sack with a snake and a dog and tossed in a river, thus both figuratively and literally consigning them to the devil.

We no longer burn witches, neither do we feel altogether safe from their malign influence. No one can have travelled far in our country without having noticed the horseshoe nailed over the mantel-piece as a protection from their nefarious practices. It may be seen, for instance, over the door of the cloakroom in one of the first-class hotels in Louisville, Ky. The horse-shoe is probably the modern representative of the rostrum lupi that the ancient Romans were wont to place in the same position for the same purpose. By discreet inquiry we have found in certain sections lingering traditions of those mysterious nocturnal gatherings of the witches that play such an important part in the old witch trials, and that in the sixteenth century, under the name of le Sabbat, gained such an infamous notoriety in France, at which the adoration of the devil by profane and obscene observances was the main feature.

It is very natural to suppose that the evil spirit can be propitiated by proper respect. "The devil is good to his own," is an old proverb, and the belief that he will assist those who call upon him is not yet wholly extirpated. Doubtless many of our readers can recall a benevolent method of curing a hordeolum or sty, not mentioned in surgical works, namely, by going alone to a cross-roads and pronouncing the following doggerel distich:

"Sty, sty,
Go out of my eye,
And go on the one who next passes by."

Now, this is nothing less than an appeal to the devil, who in the middle ages was usually invoked at cross-roads. Here suicides were buried without bell or candle and with a stake through their hearts, and here the Lombards impaled and buried alive those wretched mothers who destroyed their own offspring, all of which, in the opinion of the French academician Maury (Magie de l'Astrologie au Moyen Age,) looks back to the time when Hecate had her altars in these sites, and was called Triodites by the Greeks, and Trivia by the Romans. We are almost afraid that our veracity may be questioned when we add that, in a State adjoining New York, once during a great drought, we knew the leaf from the Common-Prayer book which contains the prayer for rain to be torn out and nailed up at the cross-roads, in order to hasten the wished-for showers!

We no longer hold that epileptics are possessed by evil spirits, and have dropped the practice of exorcising diseases, but many a one still regard impure thoughts and impulses as "crafts and assaults of the devil," and various events in them as temptations. We have found few, however, in the course of our researches, who earnestly prayed to be delivered from the temptation of riches. The prayer-book of the English and Episcopal Churches expressly recognizes sickness as a punishment of sin, and the power of evil spirits to work us injury. Based on this view, the vulgar retain to-day a sovereign respect for charms, tokens, and lucky pieces. An army surgeon of experience, who is curious on such subjects, tells us he very frequently finds soldiers whom he induces to confess to the possession of some such protection against inimical bullets, ready perhaps to laugh at the idea, but nowise willing to give up the amulet. The belief in charmed bullets used to be as prevalent in the West and South as in the native forests of Der Freischutz, and we well recollect being informed in all seriousness by an old hunter in Florida that a white deer could only be killed by a silver ball.

A horse-chestnut kept in the pocket is said to prevent the rheumatism, and doubtless it is quite as efficient as the "galvanized rings" extensively sold for the same purpose some years ago. For the benefit of those troubled by those unsightly excrescences—warts—we suggest several methods of excellent repute whereby they can get rid of them. They may tie as many knots in a string as they have warts, then burn the string, and the warts will disappear; or they must pluck from the tail of a white horse as many hairs as they have warts, hang them on the chimney-crane, and the warts will straightway wither; or, again, they should steal a piece of meat, cut it into pieces corresponding in number with the warts, then bury them, and as the pieces decay the warts will disappear.

What is known as the "eye-stone" is in great repute in many parts of our country as a facile method of removing foreign bodies from the eye. In color, size and shape, it closely resembles the half of a small pea, and is said to be obtained from marine animals. It is supposed to be alive, and in employing it the custom is to "freshen" it in vinegar diluted with water, when it will "breathe out its air" and move slowly round and round the bottom of the vessel; then, when it is sufficiently restored by this process, to insert it under the eyelid, where it will move in a similar manner, until it expels the foreign substances. It is clear from this description that it is one of those calcareous animal secretions allied to what anatomists call "sesamoid bones," and in its action precisely resembles a flaxseed, which by virtue of its form is a favorite domestic remedy for foreign bodies under the eyelids.

We are not so ready with an explanation of the "mad-stone" used to obviate ill effects from the bites of rabid animals. This is a light, porous stone of extreme rarity and uncertain origin, resembling lava or tufa. It is placed upon the fresh wound, where it clings like a dry sponge, gradually absorbing the poison till filled, when it is allowed to drop off. It is then placed in milk till the virus rises to the surface, in appearance a thin greenish fluid, when the stone is applied again to the wound, and the process repeated as long as it will cling. These "mad-stoues" enjoy a great reputation in the West, and are sought for far and wide. There is one of distinguished efficacy in the town of Lincoln, Indiana, and a second of much renown in Jersey county, Illinois. By the Quincy Herald of May 29, this year, it appears that the former was lately applied in a case of rabies, and much to the chagrin and disappointment of its admirers proved of no efficacy whatever, the patient dying with symptoms of hydrophobia.

The sale of "love charms," though incredible, is a most lucrative business. We know an energetic individual in a certain Eastern city who purchased at a bargain two barrels of canary seed, and being at a loss what to do with such an amount, was suddenly struck with the brilliant idea to have it ground and put up in neat little packages, and to advertise it extensively as an infallible "love-powder." The result of his venture proved most conclusively not only his discretion but the ignorance of our population, for he shortly sold out the whole at a most handsome percentage. Let us, however, throw the veil of charity over these facts, for have we not all, like Polonius, in our youth suffered much extremity for love? Can we not ourselves look back to that happy hour, when, alone with our first love 'neath melodious trees, we broke the piece of silver, and each treasured a fragment to render our flames immortal? Would that our innocent faith had been well founded! But, alas! alas! varium et mutabile semper!

The baculus divinatorius, or divining-rod, is much in vogue in some parts of the West in digging wells and prospecting for metals. Some years ago its revelations became the subject of scientific investigations, and several curious articles on its power appeared in Silliman's Journal and other periodicals. Such doings were evidently not in good odor with our ancestors, for we read in the early annals of Pennsylvania that in 1693 one Robert Romans was fined five pounds and charges "for practicing Geomancy according to Hidon, and Divining with a Stick." (Hazard's Register, V., 150.) We may add, for the benefit of les bibliophiles, that the Hidon here referred to was the author of a popular work on divination, entitled The Temple of Wisdom.

We might with facility extend this enumeration of our superstitions, and doubtless the greater part has never come to our notice, but we refrain. To the antiquarian and to the student of national character the subject is full of interest; but what we have already said will probably satisfy the general reader, and convince him that we are not so enlightened a people as he had fondly flattered himself.—Round Table.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1864.

"THE NEWS."

THE heading of this article is mainly monopolized by the daily press; the news is something with which a weekly journal scarcely dare to venture. So many stories come over the wires during the seven days which intervene between each issue, and a report of victory treads so closely on the heels of annonncements ambiguous at least, and details which can only be construed to read defeat, that an article written in the middle of the week would scarcely do for the day of publication; and to attempt to follow "the situation," as told by the correspondents at the other end of the wires, would leave onr army withont a situation at all, at the critical moment of going to press.

The exaggerations and contradictions of the telegraph, to call them by no harsher name, must be excessively puzzling to those who are ignorant of the source whence they emanate, and they are certainly calculated to lessen the popular respect for the Government with the great mass who think that everything that travels over the wires is official, coming directly from the Bureau at Washington. A word of explanation will perhaps correct an erroneous impression on the part of the multitude, and do away with the idea that our nation through its head is given to mendacity.

The telegrams which come to California are compiled from the reports of the associated press and the special letters to newspapers at the East. Each of these newspapers has at least one correspondent at the various theatres of war, some have more. By the rules of the associated press no journal connected with it can receive a special telegram from any point except Washington, consequently all telegrams from the army are nsed for the common benefit of the association. With letters it is different; special correspondence is premitted. Those who have ever beeu on a battle-field will recognize the utter impossibility of one man's giving an idea of the battle or attempting to tell amid the smoke, confusion and excitement of the moment how it has gone. Frank Pixley has been to the front aud will probably make affidavit to the trnth of this statement. A battle-field when an hundred thousand men or more are engaged on a side occupies a somewhat larger area than one of the skirmish drills which were in vogue on training days when the old-fashioned militia system prevailed. It extends for miles; the rear ranks are almost out from sight of the advance columns, and correspondents are not in the habit of riding with the van. They are paid for writing the obituaries of others, and not for themselves, furnishing subjects for mortuary notices. They get their ideas of what is going on, and what has been done, from what others tell them, rather than from personal observation. The correspondent feels that he is there for a purpose, and that purpose he is anxious to accomplish; but the obstacles in his way are manifold. A furious cannonading and an incessaut rattle of musketry are going on, and his position is somewhat like that of a fly in a thunderstorm. Geuerals are too busy to talk to him, and could not much enlighten him if they did. And the word of the rank and file is not much to be relied on. If he buttonholes a corporal running to the rear, the corporal will tell him, nine times in ten, that his whole regiment has been cut to pieces, and that he, the sole survivor, only escaped by the exercise of prodigious valor. The only thing that he can do is to watch and wait and guess, collating as many accounts as he can, reconciling them as best he may, telegraphing them on as speedily as possible, and trusting to Providence and the result to bear him out. Of conrse he has his friends to reward; the general officer or colonel who has dined him and wined him must have favorable mention; the engagement must have been brilliantly conducted and hotly contested on the part of the Federal forces; if a retreat has been necessitated, it must be a withdrawal for purely strategic reasons, and in any event our loss in killed and wounded must be nominal merely—the enemy's much greater. All the news or reports he gathers and guesses are strung together as straightly and consistently as possible, and bundled off to the journal in whose employ he is, to be telegraphed to California almost simnltaneously with their appearance in New York. The War Department receives a tolerably truthful estimate of the progress of the battle from the General in command, but the Government doesn't gabble, and its news is always allowed to cool before being communicated to the public. And even the General, if he is not whipped, is very apt to claim a victory, and thus it is that we hear of simultaneous rejoicings in Richmond and Washington when in reality no postive advantage has been gained by either side. The fact of the matter is, that we must school ourselves to receive the reports from the seat of war with a great many grains of allowance, and never huzza very enthusiastically over the first blush of a result as transmitted by the wires. Indeed, this lesson has already been pretty well learned, and impromptn bonfires and extempore rejoicings are no longer in order on this coast. When tangible results come, aud official statements of losses and gains, it is time enough to burn the powder of triumph. One thing must always be borne in mind—that a defeat is slow to be acknowledged, and that the most trifling advantage is never underestimated.

The latest report which last evening bronght about the discovery of an armed association at the North of five hundred thousand men in the enemy's interest may be true, but it has the look of a canard. Certainly, if true, it reflects little credit on the vigilance and faithfulness of the authorities who permitted such a thing to ripen to a head under their very eyes, to only discover it at this late moment. The thing is possible, bnt it is scarcely probable. In any event, we shall not give the report credence until further news and the result of deliberate investigation confirms it. We are loth to believe that five hundred thousand traitors of such a stamp could be found among the population of the North. It is a libel on the nation which we are slow to credit.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

OUR latest advices from the East received by the Overland mail are under date of the 8th inst. At that date, and for a week previously, financial affairs in Wall street were exciting much interest. The appointment of Mr. Fessenden as the successor of Mr. Chase appears to have been received with satisfaction. Little was known of the policy of the new Secretary of the Treasury, but it was thought his former conservatism as Chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate would still be adhered to. His views have been severely criticised and opposed by certain Senators, but it must be conceded that many of their efforts to legislate unwisely for the country have been thwarted by the statesmanship and enlightened judgment of Mr. Fesseuden. He is not a radical in any sense of the term, and the finances of the country are likely in future to be administered on a more conservative basis. If proper liberty of action is allowed him in his new sphere, important and much-needed reforms will take place in the Treasury Department. The former war upon the State Banks will probably now cease. No further incorporations under the National Bank Act will take place, and a better feeling will at once ensue between the real capitalists of the country and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The money market in New York at the date above mentioned was very much disturbed, and a want of harmony among the leading banks in regard to their settlements with each other still existed. These troubles were growing more serious, and greatly embarrassed the daily transactions at the Clearing House. The most pressing borrowers at the bank and in the open market were from the Corn Exchange, where speculators were willing to pay excessive rates to enable them to facilitate their operations. Another demand came from the holders of foreign merchandise, who had marked up their goods and were attempting to sell or carry them at the prices corresponding to the rise in gold. A large amount of greenbacks were also required for transmission to the country for the purchase of wool in Northern New York, Ohio, Michigan and Vermont. The unnsual demand from the Stock Brokers was also pressing, many of whom were sellers of United States, on account of parties in Philadelphia and Boston, indicating a stringency in those quarters.

Legal Tender notes in this market have been freely offered during the week, and declined from 42 to 39. Government officials in this city are now disbursing large sums; and it is thought that nearly $1,000,000 will be paid out during the enrrent month. Our latest Eastern advices, under date of the 27th inst., quote Gold at 250.

The Money market is unchanged, and the same plethora exists, owing to causes frequently alluded to in these columns. The projected establishmeut of a humber of new banking institutions in this city, is likely to assume no definite shape at present, unless a more inviting field should be offered for the employment of additional capital.

The Stock market continues exceedingly depressed, and with scarce au exception, all shares have still further declined. At no former period was the stagnation so universal as now. It is difficult at present to sell anything, and the least pressure appears to force down prices from day to day—no sustaining power being visible. If the decline should continue much longer, it would be safe to conclude that a settling point had been reached. Utter demoralization at the moment rules the Stock Exchange; and those who can weather the storm, and hold on to stocks that are now almost valueless, will, in the end, reap a harvest. A reaction will surely come.

Gould and Curry steadily declined from $1,565 to $1,200, and closes at $965. Some 60 feet have been sold this week.

Ophir fell from $530 to $425, and is held to-day at about $430. 28 feet have changed hands within this range.

Potosi has been well maintained at from $950 to $985, and considerable sales were made at these rates.

Yellow Jacket fell from $500 to $425, rallied slightly to $435, and was held yesterday afternoon at $425.

Imperial declined from $150 to $142, then rose to $144. 85 shares changing hands.

Burning Moscow has been weak and inactive at about $13¼, $13 and $12.

North American rose from $37 to $44, and then fell to $32½.

Bullion declined from $55 to $40.

Golden Age and Empire has declined from $16 to $13.

Lady Bryan has been largely dealt in at from $3¼ and 3¼. 720 shares changing hands.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

FULL honses and unabated success have attended the second week of English opera at the Academy of Music. On Monday evening Linda di Chamounix was given. It was a modified version, with much of the recitative turned into dialogue—the plums retained, without too much pudding, which is apt to be heavy. Alone, it would have been quite enough to draw a fine house, but the "occasion" of the evening was the début of Miss Jennie Kempton as "Pierotto." The new contralto has a voice of considerable power and pathos—rich, full and sympathetic; a pnre style, and, what is rare enough for commendation, sings recitative remarkably well. She also enunciates her words clearly and distinctly. Her further attractions are those of a good-looking blonde with a fine figure, but her movements were somewhat constrained by the habiliments of the ruder sex. On subsequent nights she seemed more at ease in her boys'-clothes, and could she have been induced to have regarded her guitar more as a musical instrument than an article of clothing she would have done better. Yet for her first operatic performance—as we are told it was—she acted fairly enough. Her Savoyard song—the first strain of which is continually recurring throngh the opera with an inexpressibly tender and touching effect—was very beautifully given, as was also her duet with "Linda" (Miss Richings) in the second act.

The part of "Linda" is written high, and Miss Richings' voice in this role was subjected to a severe trial for a mezzo soprano, although her success in the Daughter of the Regiment was a sufficient justification for the attempt. It was more than an attempt, however, and proved to be a success; she sustained the difficult role very effectively, and with wonderful power, considering the tax upon her voice by the steady performances of the past week. But in spite of these exceptional efforts and her fine low notes, we think the middle register of her voice the most charming, as well as the most enduring basis for her musical reputation. Her acting throughout the piece was capital. Nothing seemed to us to be more unaffected and natural than her madness in the second act. It is true that this criticism of her assumed insanity has the disadvantage of being ex parte, and written from a sane view point, but the extreme simplicity and naturalness of Miss Richings' acting, her freedom from stage-trickery and mannerisms, under all circumstances, is something so patent that it is only when denied in one point we think it worthy of reiteration.

Mr. Hill sustained the part of "Carlo" to the extent of his sweet, though undeveloped, voice. He seems to be gaining confidence and strength; and the same may be said of Mr. Seguin, although this gentleman's style and cultivation as yet exceeds the qualities of his voice. Mr. Peakes (the "Prefect") had a somewhat prominent role, and fully kept up the reputation of his voice, although he exhibited its lack of cultivation more on this occasion than any other. His duet with the baritone was continually marred by crudities, and his blunder of sometimes taking breath in the middle of a word was intolerable. Mr. Richings as the "Marquis" was a fine old beau, who took snuff, cracked sly jokes, and paid high-flown compliments as Marquises of the old and moral regime very probably were in the habit of doing. The choruses are entitled to great praise, not only on this occasion bnt others, for their uniform ability, which is remarkable for California. The prayer in the third act would have had a better effect if it had been not so forte as to mar the religious expression and sentiment of the music. The opera was exceedingly well dressed and appointed, and the parlor scene in the second act was a model of good taste and ingenuity. Last evening The Daughter of the Regiment was performed to a fair house. This evening and to-morrow evening The Doctor of Alcantara, a new comic opera, purchased by Miss Richings of the composer, Julius Eichberg, will be produced.

At Maguire's Opera House Bel Demonio has ruled during the week. The play is founded, like the Pope of Rome, upon the historical story of the Cardinal who shammed illness and decrepitude in order to secure his election to the Papal chair. Mr. Wheatleigh is the Cardinal, but the part does not offer him a very advantageous field for the display of his best talent—in fact the Cardinal is not at all cardinal to the success of the piece, other than as the mechanical frame upon which the plot of the play and its scenery may be built. Great pains have been taken with the scenery, and some very remarkable effects have been produced. We understand for the first time in life what is meant by "rolling waves" when we see three spiral columns, horizontally laid, boring aimlessly away like three huge gimlets propelled by the nervous hands of some unseen carpenter. The play opens livelily and well, and the first scene is particularly good, the dialogue being very well managed. Towards the middle, however, it drags, and might be cut down without detriment to the piece or dissatisfaction to the audience. The principal parts fall to the lot of Messrs. Mayo and Thorne, and are very well sustained by those gentlemen. The plot may be briefly summed up by stating that "Angelo Braccioforte" (Mayo) falls in love—in the repertoire of the lobbies they would say, "gets stuck"—with "Lena Campireali;" (Mrs. Edwin;) her parents are wealthy, and object; but he goes in, fights everybody, rolls off a precipice, and finally gets her. "Ranunncio" (Thorne) is his friend, and stands by him staunch and true all the while. It is usually Mr. Thorne's luck to be the villain of the piece, and to be cast in any other role was such a novelty to him that he entered into the spirit of the character, and played it with commendable vigor. Bel Demonio will be repeated this afternoon and evening.

The Wilson circus troupe is heard from at a variety of points, and always in the same eulogistic terms. A Hippotheatron is a novelty in the interior; the majority don't exactly know what it is; but they think it is something good to eat, and go ont to see it in a body. The times, of course, tighten the receipts of the company a little, but still they are eminently encouraging. On Monday night next the troupe will exhibit at Sonora; on Tuesday at Columbia, on Wednesday at Murphy's; and from this latter place the circus train takes its way to the Washoe country, by the Big Tree route, passing through Silver Mountain and Markleeville. If Zoyara's sex is not made apparent in Washoe, it will probably remain for ever a mystery.

A BOYS' DOG.

AS I lift my eyes from the paper, I observe a dog lying on the steps of the opposite house. His attitude might induce passers-by and casual observers to believe him to belong to the people who live there, and to accord to him a certain standing and position. I have seen visitors pat him, under the impression that they were doing an act of courtesy to his master—he lending himself to the fraud by hypocritical contortions of the body. But his attitude is one of deceit and simulation. He has neither master nor habitation. He is a very Pariah and outcast; in brief, "A Boys' Dog."

There is a degree of hopcless and irreclaimable vagabondage expressed in this epithet, which may not be generally understood. Only those who are familiar with the roving nature and predatory instincts of boys in large cities will appreciate its strength. It is the lowest step in the social scale to which a respectable canine can descend. A blind man's dog, or the companion of a knife-grinder, is comparatively elevated. He at least owes allegiance to but one master. But the Boys' dog is the thrall of an entire juvenile community, obedient to the beck and call of the smallest imp in the neighborhood, attached to and serving not the individual boy so much as the boy element and principle. In their active sports—in small thefts, raids into back-yards, window-breaking and other minor juvenile recreations—he is a full participant. In this way he is the reflection of the wickedness of many masters, without possessing the virtues or peculiarities of any particular one.

If leading a "dog's life" be considered a peculiar phase of human misery, the life of a Boys' dog is still more infelicitous. He is associated in all schemes of wrong-doing, and unless he be a dog of experience, is always the scape-goat. He never shares the booty of his associates. In the absence of legitimate amusement, he is considered fair game for his companions; and I have seen him reduced to the ignominy of having a tin kettle tied to his tail. His ears and tail have generally been docked to suit the caprice of the unholy band of which he is a member; and if he has any spunk, he is invariably pitted against larger dogs in mortal combat. He is poorly fed, and hourly abused; the reputation of his associates debars him from outside sympathies; and once a Boys' dog, he cannot change his condition. He is not unfrequently sold into slavery by his inhuman companions. I remember once to have been accosted on my own doorsteps by a couple of precocious youths, who offered to sell me a dog which they were then leading by a rope. The price was extremely moderate, being, if I remember rightly, but fifty cents. Imagining the unfortunate animal to have lately fallen into their wicked hands, and anxious to reclaim him from the degradation of becoming a Boys' dog, I was about to conclude the bargain, when I saw a look of intelligence pass between the dog and his two masters. I promptly stopped all negotiation, and drove the youthful swindlers and their four-footed accomplice from my presence. The whole thing was perfectly plain. The dog was an old, experienced, and hardened Boys' dog, and I was perfectly satisfied that he would run away and rejoin his old companions at the first opportunity. This I afterwards learned he did, on the occasion of a kind-hearted but unsophisticated neighbor buying him; and a few days ago I saw him exposed for sale by those two Arcadians, in another neighborhood, having been bought and paid for half-a-dozen times in this.

But, it will be asked, if the life of a Boys' dog is so unhappy, why do they enter upon such an unenviable situation, and why do they not dissolve the partnership when it becomes unpleasant? I will confess that I have been often puzzled by this question. For some time I could not make up my mind whether their unholy alliance was the result of the influence of the dog on the boy, or vice versa, and which was the weakest and most impressible nature. I am satisfied now that, at first, the dog is undoubtedly influenced by the boy, and as it were, is led while yet a puppy, from the paths of canine rectitude by artful and designing boys. As he grows older and more experienced in the ways of his Bohemian friends, he becomes a willing decoy, and takes delight in luring boyish innocence astray—in beguiling children to play truant, and thus revenges his own degradation on the Boy nature generally. It is in this relation, and in regard to certain unhallowed practices I have detected him in, that I deem it proper to expose to parents and guardians the danger to which their offspring is exposed by the Boys' dog

The Boys' dog lays his plans artfully. He begins to influence the youthful mind by suggestions of unrestrained freedom and frolic which he offers in his own person. He will lie in wait at the garden gate for a very small boy, and endeavor to lure him outside its sacred precincts, by gambolling and jumping a little beyond the enclosure. He will set off on an imaginary chase and run round the block in a perfectly frantic manner, and then return, breathless, to his former position with a look as of one who would say, "There, you see how perfectly easy it's done!" Should the unhappy infant find it difficult to resist the effect which this glimpse of the area of freedom produces, and step beyond the gate, from that moment he is utterly demoralized. The Boys' dog owns him body and soul. Straightway is he led by the deceitful brute into the unhallowed circle of his Bohemian masters. Sometimes the unfortunate boy, if he be very small, turns up eventually at the station-house as a lost child. Whenever I meet a stray boy in the street looking utterly bewildered and astonished, I generally find a Boy's dog lurking on the corner. When I read the advertisements of lost children, I always add mentally to the description, "was last seen in company with a Boy's dog." Nor is his influence wholly confined to small boys. I have seen him waiting patiently for larger boys on the way to school, and by artful and sophistical practices inducing them to play truant. I have seen him lying at the school-house door, with the intention of enticing the children on their way home to distant and remote localities. He has led many an unsuspecting boy to the wharves and quays by assuming the character of a water-dog, which he was not, and again has induced others to go with him on a gunning excursion by pretending to be a sporting dog, in which quality he was knowingly deficient. Unscrupulous, hypocritical and deceitful, he has won many children's hearts by answering to any name they might call him, attaching himself to their persons until they got into trouble, and deserting them at the very moment they most needed his assistance. I have seen him rob small school-boys of their dinners by pretending to knock them down by accident; and have seen larger boys in turn dispossess him of his ill-gotten booty, for their own private gratification. From being a tool, he has grown to be an accomplice—through much imposition he has learned to impose on others—in his best character he is simply a vagabond's vagabond.

I could find it in my heart to pity him, as he lies there through the long summer afternoon, enjoying brief intervals of tranquillity and rest which he surreptitiously snatches from a stranger's doorstep. For a shrill whistle is heard in the streets, the boys are coming home from school, and he is startled from his dreams by a deftly-thrown potato which hits him on the head, and awakens him to the stern reality that he is now and forever—a Boy's dog.

BULLION RECEIPTS AT THE MINT.—The following are the receipts of treasure at the Branch Mint during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864: California, 805,299.39 ozs.; Oregon, 122,246.07 ozs.; Idaho Territory, 71,857.77 ozs.; British Columbia, 24,697.13 ozs.; Washington Territory, 706.24 ozs.; Nevada Territory, 696.42 ozs.; Arizona, 413.25 ozs.; Mexico, 326.36 ozs., and foreign coin, 2,319.43 ozs.

"Manhattan," the New York correspondent of the London Standard, is dead. His real name was Joseph Scoville, and he wrote the reminiscences of old merchants which, for some time past, have formed a feature of the New York Leader, over the signature of "Walter Barrett, Clerk." His novel, Marion, lately published in London, was a reprint, with the name changed, of a tale called Vigor, which a respectable New York publisher, some years since, sent out with his own imprint, but immediately withdrew from circulation and his list as soon as he discovered its very gross character. Mudie forbade Marion access to his circulating library, and the London press generally denounces the book as prurient and immoral, as well as badly written.

An editor of a Celtic paper published in this city committed the mistake lately of making an "impression" on the wrong "sheets." His wife read the "proof;" and there was a "chase," or rather a "pair of chases"—both offenders were "distributed." Altogether it is the most decided case of "wrong font" that has occurred in a newspaper office for centuries. Of course the blame belongs to the "devil."

Miss Jean Ingelow, the poetess, has contributed $100 to the fund of the Philadelphia Sanitary Fair, as a token of her "sympathy with the soldiers and the cause they fight for." As an instance of what fame is worth, we notice that a poem by this charming poetess is going the rounds of the interior press credited to "John Bingelow."

THE card of Dr. George F. Woodward, surgeon to the United States Pension Bureau of San Francisco, will be found in another column. Dr. Woodward brings excellent endorsement of his skill from his Eastern field of practice. The New York Herald, in a notice of his departure, says: "The doctor stands high in this community as one of our most eminent surgeons and medical practitioners, and leaves a large and valuable field of practice to locate himself in future in the Golden State of California, where higher honors than those now conferred, we trust, await him."

Show may easily be purchased; but happiness is always a home-made article.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

THE ultimate reliance of a human being is, and must be, his own mind. To confide in God, we must first confide in the faculties by which he is apprehended, and by which the proofs of his existence are weighed. A trust in our ability to distinguish between truth and falsehood is implied in every act of belief; for to question this ability would of necessity unsettle all belief. We cannot take a step in reasoning, or action, without a secret reliance on our own minds. Religion, in particular, implies that we have understandings endowed and qualified for the highest employments of intellect. In affirming the existence and perfections of God, we suppose and affirm the existence in ourselves of faculties which correspond to these sublime objects, and which are fitted to discern them. Religion is a conviction and an act of the human soul; so that in denying confidence to the one we subvert the truth and claims of the other. Nothing is gained to piety by degrading human nature; for in the competency of this nature to know and judge of God, all piety has its foundation. Our proneness to evil instructs us indeed to use our powers with great caution, but not to contemn and neglect them. The occasional abuse of our faculties, be it ever so enormous, does not prove them unfit for their highest end, which is to form clear and consistent views of God. Because our eyes sometimes fail or deceive us, would a wise man pluck them out, or cover them with a bandage, and choose to walk and work in the dark? or because they cannot distinguish distant objects, can they discern nothing clearly in their proper sphere, and is sight to be pronounced a fallacious guide? Men who, to support a creed, would shake our trust in the calm, deliberate and distinct decisions of our national and moral powers, endanger religion more than its open foes, and forge the deadliest weapon for the infidel.—Channing against Calvinism.

THEMISTOCLES, after the victory in that war which took place with the Persians, said in the Assembly that he had a plan salutary for the State, but that it was necessary that it should not be publicly known. He demanded that the people should appoint some one with whom he might communicate. Aristides was appointed. To him he disclosed that the fleet of the Lacedemonians, which was in the dock at Gytheum, could secretly be burned, of which act the necessary consequence would be that the power of the Lacedemonians would be broken; which, when Aristides had heard, he came into the Assembly, amidst great expectations of the people, and said that the plan which Themistocles proposed was very expedient, but by no means honorable. Therefore, the Athenians were of the opinion that what was not upright was not even expedient, and on the authority of Aristides rejected that entire matter, which they had not even heard.—Ibid, chap. xiii.

To every form of being is assigned
An active principle howe'er removed
From sense and observation; it subsists
In all things, in all natures, in the stars
Of azure heaven, the unenduring clouds,
In flower and tree, and every pebbly stone,
That paves the brooks, the stationary rocks,
The moving waters and the invisible air.
Whate'er exists has properties that spread
Beyond itself, communicating good,
A simple blessing or with evil mixed;
Spirit that knows no insulated spot,
No chasm, no solitude, from link to link
It circulates the soul of all the worlds.—Wordsworth.

THEODORE attended lectures on the doctrine of morals by a Kantian philosopher, whereby a whole new world was opened to him. The thought of the self dependence of the reason in its utterance of laws; of the freedom of the will, by which it is lifted above nature and fate; of the disinterestedness of virtue, sufficient for itself and needing no reward; of pure respect for a self-imposed moral law—these new ideas seized his mind with a mighty power, and filled him with lofty consciousness of his personal dignity.—De Wette.

WHILST no human character in the history of the world can be brought to mind which, in proportion as it could be closely examined, did not present some defects disqualifying it from being the emblem of moral perfection, we can rest with least check or sense of incongruity on the imperfectly known character of Jesus of Nazareth. If a representative be sought of human virtue, enough is still seen of his benevolent doctrine, attractive character and elevated designs, to direct our eyes to the Prophet and Martyr of Galilee.—*Hennell—Orig. A REMARKABLE TRIAL.

THE CROWN versus RICHARD BEECROFT AND OTHERS.

THIS trial took place in the assize court, Lincoln city, on Wednesday, July 16th, 1699. Richard Beecroft, attorney-at-law, John Edwards, gardener, and William Earle, gentleman, were indicted for the murder of Ellen Gay, a young and very attractive gentlewoman, "though, it may be, of a flighty, incontinent temper," possessed of considerable landed property in her own right, bequeathed by a paternal maiden aunt. The presiding judge was Mr. Baron Hatsell.

The indictment, stripped of its surplusage, charged the prisoners that they, not having God before their eyes, and being moved and seduced of the devil, did, on the 13th day of March, in the 11th year of the king's reign, commit a felonious assault upon one Ellen Gay, "and afterwards binding a rope of no value about her neck, did strangle, smother her, and afterwards throw her body into a mill-dam river."

Mr. Serjeant Burt was counsel for the Crown. The first portion of the speech I shall give in the first person, and pretty nearly in his own words, affording as it does a striking illustration of the state of medical science in those days.

"The prisoner Beecroft," said the learned gentleman, "had been long previously acquainted with Ellen Gay. He is a gentleman having a good practice in Boston. Being about to accompany the assize court on circuit, he sent a letter to the deceased, penned in the handwriting of his wife, which stated that he would call upon the young lady's mother. He did so, and stayed to sup, intending, as he said, to remain during the night. And at 11 o'clock, gentlemen," continued Mr. Serjeant, "he having been sitting privately with the young lady for several hours, an order was given, in his hearing, to warm a bed for him. One of the servants did accordingly warm his bed, expecting he would follow. Instead of that, whilst she was warming the bed, she heard the street door opened and shut. Now the nature of that door is such, that upon its clapping to, all the house would hear the noise. There can be no possible mistake about this, that the door was opened and shut only once. Now, excepting the prisoner Beecroft and Ellen Gay, no one had left the house. A fair presumption, then, is that they left together. The servant, at hearing the door slam, and finding Mr. Beecroft did not come to his room, became, after a while, uneasy in her mind. She went downstairs and roused the mother, Mrs Gay. These sat up together all night, much distressed, and wondering at the absence of Beecroft and the young mistress. They sat up in vain expectation of the return of the absent ones, and the next morning the first news of the young lady was that she lay drowned, but floating, in the river not far from the mill-dam. Upon that many persons assembled, for it was a surprise how it should come to pass. Now this made a great noise, which was natural. There she lay floating with her petticoats and apron, but her night-rail (sic) and morning gown were off. It must, indeed, be held very extraordinary, that from the time the servant left Mr. Beecroft and her young mistress together she was not seen or heard of till next morning, and then found in such a condition, with her eyes wide open, floating on the water. It will also be proved that a mortgage deed, executed by the young lady about two months before her death, has been produced by Mr. Mason, a wealthy person residing at Boston, upon which the prisoner Beecroft raised £3,500. At this the relatives of Miss Gay were greatly amazed. What possible reason could she have for so obtaining such a large sum? More than all, what use had she put the money to? There were but fifteen guineas and a few pieces of silver found in her desk, and no one ever saw or heard of any considerable sum of money. The prisoner Beecroft has declared he paid the amount over in gold spade guineas, chiefly to the deceased herself, and that the young lady, having no maid with her, carried such a heavy charge away. With respect to that circumstance, credible witnesses will have pertinent things to relate. Another important circumstance, which I had almost forgotten, is, that the lady's purse was in her pocket, but a very valuable diamond brooch could not be found. That might, however, have slipped into the stream."

Unquestionably this, so far, was a formidable opening of the case against the prisoner Beecroft; but the learned Serjeant, in his zeal to convict, made the mistake of endeavoring to prove too much. With special earnestness he urged the alleged fact, in anticipated reply to the defence, which it was known would be set up.

"When the body came to be viewed," said Serjeant Burt, "it was much wondered at; because it is contrary to nature that persons who have drowned themselves should float upon the water. We have sufficient evidence that it is a thing that never was. If persons fall alive into the water, then they sink; if dead, then they swim. At first it was thought such a thing might have happened, though no one could imagine why this young gentlewoman should have incurred the crime of felo-de-se. And upon closer examination it did appear there had been violence used to the deceased. There was a crease round her neck. She was bruised about the ear; so that it did seem certain she had been strangled by hands or a rope. No question this matter is dark and blind, as all wicked actions are—done in secret, to be kept from the knowledge of men as much as possible."

Here Mr. Serjeant was stopped by Baron Hatsell, who told him "not to flourish so much."

After some further observations, the counsel for the Crown proceeded to establish his case by evidence. The medical testimony, intended to prove, beyond all doubt, that only persons already dead ever float upon the water, was weak and contradictory. With respect to that the prosecution had broken, or, at least, had not to the satisfaction of the court or jury established the alleged fact.

The evidence against the prisoner was sufficiently damning without it. The woman-servant who warmed the bed swore distinctly that not only was the street door only opened once, but that she heard the tread of two pairs of feet along the passage, and the deceased talking more loudly than usual with her to Mr. Beecroft. Then the door slammed to with a loud noise. In cross-examination she admitted that the deceased had been melancholy at times of late. She was of rather a passionate temper, but good-hearted, generous. The last time she saw Beecroft and her together they appeared to be as good friends as ever. She sat up with Mrs. Gay all night, and had offered to go in search of the absent young lady; but her mother refused, as it would make a talk in the town. It was about 11 o'clock when she went up stairs, to warm the bed.

William Roberts, landlord of the "Golden Fleece," deposed, that towards 11 o'clock on the night of the 15th of March, Mr. William Earle, a gentleman of family, though it was reported considerably reduced in means, and whom he had seen in former days walking with the deceased Miss Gay, came into the "Golden Fleece," and asked if he could have beds for the night for himself and another person. Being told he could, he ordered a fire to be lit; and though then the worse for wine, ordered a jug of mulled claret, with which he was served. He was very pale—ghastly white, indeed—though flustered with drink, and appeared to be very moody-minded, sitting with his hands on his knees, staring at the fire. At near 12, John Edwards, formerly gardener in Mr. Earle's employ, but who had been some months out of work, came in with a small bundle in his hand. He asked for his former master, and was shown into the room where Mr. Earle sat. More wine was ordered, and both drank together as if equals in station, at which he, Roberts, was surprised. Edwards looked almost as white and agitated as did Mr. Earle. Edwards had once been a man well-to-do, but had fallen in the in world. He was said to be a man of good education, and there was a report that Mr. Earle meant to get him a nursery garden, and set him going again. Twice when he, Roberts, entered, the words Miss Ellen Gay, or Ellen May, were twice spoken, both times by Edwards. They were uttered in a low tone, but the witness caught them distinctly. He was quite sure of that. In about a quarter of an hour Mr. Beecroft knocked at the outer door, and asked if Mr. Earle was there. Witness did not, to the best of his recollection, mention Edwards, who, when he entered the room to ask Mr. Earle if he would see Mr. Beecroft, jumped up from his chair, his face flushed to the color of flame, seized Mr. Earle roughly by the arm, and whispered hurriedly in his ear. The witness thought that strange, but of course made no remark. Mr. Earle said he would see Mr. Beecroft. The attorney did not stay very long. Witness, whose curiosity was strongly excited, he hardly knew why, listening outside, heard through the thin panelling the name of Miss Gay repeated at least a dozen times; but in so quiet a tone was the conversation—in which Edwards freely joined—carried on, that he could only make out that it related to Miss Gay and a large sum of money, the division of which seemed to be in dispute.

Nothing was elicited from this witness in favor of the prisoner, except that he had known Mr. Beecroft many years, and always believed him to be a most worthy gentleman. Did not know for certain, but had lately heard he had become embarrassed in his circumstances. Mr. Earle and Edwards, who slept in a double-bedded room, rose early, and left without taking breakfast.

Mrs. Gay said her deceased daughter was an intimate friend of Mr. Beecroft's wife, and was himself much respected by her. She had understood he was employed to get back a number of letters from Mr. Earle, to whom her daughter had been engaged. She could not speak positively, as Ellen was very close and reserved. "As soon as the news of my daughter's death reached him, Mr. Beecroft rushed to our house. He appeared to be greatly distressed in mind, and presently said that certain letters, which had been returned to my unfortunate daughter through his agency, ought to be at once sought out and destroyed. I, having great confidence in Mr. Beecroft, consented. My daughter's secretaire was opened, but only two letters could be found. These I knew, by the hand-writing of the address, were from Beecroft himself. He seized them eagerly and threw them on the fire, remarking that they were of no value or consequence. I did not quite like that, and ultimately placed the whole business in the hands of Mr. Treherne, an attorney, who is now in court. A gentleman of this city was at the time of my daughter's decease paying his addresses to her. I hope it will not be insisted upon that I mention his name."

Baron Hatsell: "So far as the case has gone, you will be excused as to that. We may have clearer insight by-and-by, when it may be necessary to do so. Mistress Gay, was it customary with your daughter to wander out alone at unseemly hours of the night, unattended by servant or friend?"

"Never, my lord, that I know of. But she was of a fearless temper."

Baron Hatsell: "You are quite sure that the letters hastily tossed upon the fire by the prisoner Beecroft were in his handwriting?"

"Positive, my lord."

The prisoner Beecroft: "I have never denied that they were, my lord; but they were of no significance—had no bearing on this case."

Baron Hatsell: "So you say, which may be true, but the act itself looks strangely, coupled with other things."

Beecroft: "My lord, I am an innocent man."

Judge: "So you said before, by your plea of Not Guilty. Call the next witness, brother Burt."

Mr. Treherne was called, sworn, and examined by Serjeant Burt.

"You are an attorney, and have practiced many years in Lincoln city?"

"Upwards of thirty years."

"You have not been during that period the attorney of the Gay family?"

"No; Mr. Beecroft has been their legal agent, except upon one occasion."

"What occasion?"

"A day or two after the deceased Ellen Gay attained her majority—now about four years since—coming into the full enjoyment of her property, she instructed me—Mr. Beecroft not being at hand—to draw up a lease for seven years of the mill, near which the body was found, in favor of John Proby, miller, a worthy man, and great favorite of hers."

"The relatives of the deceased have commissioned you to investigate this terrible affair?"

"Yes. The facts that the prisoner Beecroft was the last person seen with the deceased, that he left the house with her, his bed, as he knew, being warmed for him at the time, and did not return, seemed to have, closely looked at, an ugly look. Still, no conceivable motive for the commission of such a crime could be imputed to Beecroft. This circumstance staggered me; suspicions as was the burning of the letters—"

Baron Hatsell, interrupting: "Give us the facts, Mr. Treherne; such as lie within your own knowledge; the interpretation, the just inference to be drawn from these facts, is in the province of the Court and jury. A capital felony is charged upon these men. We must be careful."

"My lord and gentlemen," continued Treherne, "a letter arrived from Mr. Mason, a highly respectable gentleman residing at Boston, which occasioned great wonder in the Gay family."

Mr. Serjeant Burt: "Have you that letter here?"

"Yes; I produce it. A claim is made therein for interest due on a mortgage bond for £3,500, which moneys, it is stated, were paid over to the prisoner Beecroft, with exception of something above £700, the amount of a long-standing debt due by Beecroft to Mason."

"Did you at once proceed to Boston to make inquiries?"

"I did; waited upon Mr. Mason, was shown the deed, and felt not the slightest doubt that the document was genuine."

"Whom did you next see and speak with in this matter?"

"The prisoner Beecroft. I was asked into the library, where I found him alone. I at once went to business. I am here, said I, to inquire of you, on behalf of the relatives of the late Miss Gay, of Lincoln, for what purpose or purposes that young lady raised £3,500 upon a mortgage deed, prepared and witnessed by yourself and two of your clerks, and which deed is now in the possession of Mr. Mason."

"What answer did the prisoner Beecroft make?"

"With much confusion and hesitancy of speech and manner he said—more correctly stammered—that he did not know. 'Do not know, Mr. Beecroft?' I exclaimed. 'That reply will not pass. You at least know that you paid a large debt of your own out of the proceeds—payment of which you had been legally pressed for?' 'Yes,' faintly replied the prisoner, rising from his chair in much agitation, and supporting himself by leaning his elbow upon the mantelpiece. 'Where was the money paid to the young lady?' I asked. 'Here in this room, to the young lady herself.' The prisoner further stated, but with the same hesitancy, that the young lady, who he admitted was alone, had carried the money in gold away with her. To this I said that something like half a hundredweight avoirdupois was a heavy burden for a delicate young lady. 'Of course you have the young lady's written acknowledgment that she received the money, and no doubt you gave her a memorandum that you had borrowed at interest, I must suppose, £700 of her?' 'No,' said the prisoner Beecroft, 'those formalities were omitted; we had confidence in each other.' Greatly provoked, and my temper getting the mastery, I said, in a heat, 'Perhaps the letters you seized and threw into the fire might have thrown a light upon the subject?' To that no reply was made. There was a pause of some length—I considering how to act; he, being a lawyer, knew he was not bound to criminate himself, but that if he chose voluntarily to answer any question I put, he was at liberty to do so. 'Now, be careful,' I said, 'Mr. Beecroft, before you answer. Did you, or did you not, keep back, retain in your hands—I do not say against the young lady's consent—more, much more, than the £700 spoken of?' 'I have told you,' said he, but with trembling tongue, 'that the deceased young lady took the moneys away with her, with the exception of the £700, against which sum there is an offset in my bill of costs.' 'You persist in that answer?' queried I. 'Yes.' 'And that you do not know the purposes for which the bulk of the money was raised—you, her legal adviser?' 'That is so.' Immediately on leaving I made notes of this conversation," added Mr. Treherne, "and can with a safe conscience say, my lord and gentlemen, that I have added nothing that might prejudice the prisoner, nor omitted anything which might tell in his favor."

"My lord," here exclaimed Beecroft, "I must have meant that I could not professionally explain or divulge the affairs of my client to a third person."

"Baron Hatsell: "Tillyfally, man!—But go on with your evidence, brother Burt."

"Serjeant Burt: "What else took place during this interview?"

"Nothing, except that when going out I caught a glimpse of Mrs. Beecroft, who must, concealed by a high screen, have been an auditor of what had been said. She, I suppose, came in unawares, even to her husband. I heard her say, with sobs and tears, 'Richard, you,' or we—I am not sure which—'are ruined—lost—!' Then there was a heavy fall on the floor—I believe the lady swooned, but cannot say with certainty."

"You afterwards saw a Mr. Holcroft?"

"Yes. He lives at Old Hall, about six miles out of Boston. From certain hints dropped by Mr. Mason, I believed the prisoner Beecroft had paid him a heavy debt, amounting to about £1,200, in gold. Mr. Beecroft had borrowed that money upon a judgment bond, and Mr. Holcroft called it up—"

Jones, counsel for Beecroft, objected. It could not be received as evidence, unless the prisoner was present when the words were spoken.

Baron Hatsell: "Certainly not. If the matter be of importance in the issue, let Holcroft himself be called."

Holcroft was called, and proved that two days after the date of the mortgage deed, Richard Beecroft paid him, under pressure, close upon £1,200 in guineas.

William Beatson, carpenter, proved that on the night of the 13th of March he met the deceased Ellen Gay. She was arm-in-arm with the prisoner Beecroft, walking in the path leading towards the mill-dam. Beatson saw no one else near the place.

This was the case for the prosecution, and a terrific, unanswerable one it must have been against Beecroft, if not the others; and as regarded them the presumptive evidence seemed strong. Counsel were not privileged to address the court in behalf of prisoners arraigned for felony. Had it been otherwise it would have tasked the talents of the ablest men at the bar to have successfully set up the following unsupported statement spoken by Richard Beecroft himself, as an answer to the case for the Crown:

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury—I deeply feel the degradation of my position, standing here accused of one of the foulest, basest crimes of which a man could be guilty. And this not so much that I am in peril of life, though a great terror, as from knowing that I have brought that peril upon myself. I am not, my lord and gentlemen, guilty of murder; my hands are clean as those of any in this court in that regard. But I am guilty of an intention—being pressed by terrible necessities, sharpened by the absolute dependence upon me of a wife and eight children—of a fraudulent intention to deprive the natural heirs—for some years to come, at all events—of the possession of a large sum of money. I lied grossly, stupidly, to carry out that fraud, and have my reward in heaped-up measure. My sin has found me out. My lord and gentlemen, I have nothing to except to the evidence offered against me. It has been truthful, candid, throughout. But the witnesses are necessarily ignorant of all the circumstances—of the whole case. As the learned counsel for the Crown remarked, 'This matter is dark and blind, as all wicked actions are—done in secret, to be kept from the knowledge of men.' These are wise words, and it is in seeing that darkness and blindness that my danger lies.

"My lord and gentlemen, I will relate all the circumstances, without straining or disguising one, of this terrible mystery, so far as they are known to me; and I regret that, in doing so, some of the facts I must state may bear unfavorably upon Mr. Earle, he being, like myself, in mortal peril.

"My lord and gentlemen, the deceased young lady and Mr. Earle were not very long ago on terms of great intimacy; many letters passed between them, and I believe matters went so far that the marriage day was fixed—"

Mr. Earle, interrupting: "That was not so."

Mr. Beecroft: "I may err upon that point. It is quite immaterial. A disagreement took place. The engagement was broken off."

Mr. Earle: "The young lady had found a wealthier suitor—"

"That remark," exclaimed Baron Hatsell, "is indecent. If true, it could not help you. Pray do not interrupt the order of the proceedings."

Mr. Beecroft: "I was saying, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, that a disagreement took place, that the match was broken off. The deceased Ellen Gay was very anxious to get back her letters: she placed the matter in my hands. I treated on her behalf with Mr. Earle, who insisted on being paid 2,000 guineas as the price of delivering them up. Finally he agreed to take 1,500, and, upon his honor as a gentleman, to keep the matter secret. Miss Gay agreed to the terms, and I paid him over the money for the twenty-seven letters—or, more correctly, as to many of them, notes—billets-doux, as they are called. Mr. Earle signed a paper drawn up by me, which set forth that he had no other letters, notes, papers of any kind, which had been sent him by the deceased, except those delivered up. Miss Gay requested me to raise the money privately by mortgage; and as the business went on, and she being great friends with my wife, it came to be understood and agreed to, that £3,500 should be raised, and after paying over to Mr. Earle the required sum, Miss Gay should allow the balance to be left in my hands on my personal security at five per cent. The deed was then executed, and Miss Gay left for Lincoln. Mr. Mason, from whom I knew I could obtain the money, would not be in Boston till late that night; and this, with the hurry of the business, must have been the reason I did not give a written acknowledgment for the money. I did, however, on the morrow write to her stating I had received the money, which is legal proof that at the time of obtaining it there was no animus furandi on my part."

Baron Hatsell: "Which proof, if a proof, you, as I take it, destroyed by casting it on the fire. Go on."

"That is so, my lord. I also wrote by the same post to Mr. Earle, requesting him to bring the letters, as endorsed, to Boston, and receive the money agreed to be paid. He came. I counted the letters, and then said, 'Before handing you this large sum of money, which ought never to have been demanded for the doing of a simple act of courtesy, you must sign this paper.' 'What is that paper?' he demanded, in an angry, surly tone. 'It is merely,' I said, 'a formal undertaking that, if these letters should prove to be not all of those sent you by Miss Gay, that you have wilfully or carelessly withheld any, and refuse prompt amends, the money you now are to receive shall be a legal charge upon your estate.' Mr. Earle signed the memorandum with a dash, as one may say, received the money and left. I, being at the time greatly busied, sealed up the letters without close scrutiny, and put them away.

"It was not, my lord, till the 8th or 9th of March that I found leisure to closely examine the letters. That examination proved to me that several were not genuine—copies, in fact, if not fabrications. This threw me into a storm of rage. I wrote immediately to Mr. Earle, saying that I should be in Lincoln on the 13th, and if not then fully satisfied, should at once proceed against him—either civilly, to obtain restitution of the money; or criminally, for felony in the procurement thereof. I wrote in the same sense to Miss Gay. Those were the letters I found in the deceased's desk and threw on the fire. Coming to Lincoln on the 13th, I before seeing my unfortunate client, rode to Mr. Earle's place, saw and spoke with the prisoner Edwards, who said Mr. Earle was out, and would not be home till 10 in the evening at earliest. I said that I would call at about that hour, my business being urgent. I then rode to the dwelling of the Gays; had a long private conversation with the deceased, who was much disturbed, and not, I frankly own, well pleased with me. The five letters I had my suspicion of she at once declared to be forgeries, and would herself go with me to see herself righted in the matter. I agreed that she might. We set out together; but when at no great distance from the river where the unfortunate young lady's body was found, Miss Gay changed her mind. 'I had better first see him, hear what he has to say to-morrow. It would be unseemly,' she added, 'that she herself should visit Mr. Earle, especially at night.' She then shook hands with me, turned back to go home, and I never saw her again except as a corpse. Mr. Earle was not at home, would not be that night, I was told, which greatly annoyed me, as I had a press of business to get through with on the next and following days. I did not go back to the Gays, but to the inn where I was stopping. There it chanced that having made some inquiries concerning Mr. Earle, I heard that he had been seen not very long before to go into the Golden Fleece. I determined to seek him there. We had, as deposed to, an interview. He denied that the letters referred to were forgeries, and said he should stand by his right and the law. We did not part good friends, though, knowing how desirous Miss Gay still was to settle the business quietly, I was not violent in word or manner. Hearing next day of the young lady's death, I, after the first shock had somewhat passed, bethought me that the two letters I had written to Miss Gay were the only evidence existing that I owed that young lady aught. The devil tempted me with that, in my actual condition, glittering prize, and I fell. All the letters received of Earle I afterwards burned. This is all, my lord and gentlemen, I have to say. I have acted as a villain touching the money, of which base deed I heartily repent; but of murder, or the thought of murder, I am as innocent as an unborn babe. This I solemnly declare, as I shall answer to the all-seeing God at the last great day. And may He send me a good deliverance."

Beecroft said he had no witnesses to call. Earle merely said that, as far as his own knowledge went, Beecroft's story was true, except his averment that some of Miss Gay's letters were forgeries. Edwards could only say that all his concernment in the matter was, that being in Mr. Earle's confidence, that gentleman had consulted him as to how he should best deal with Beecroft's charge against him.

Baron Hatsell: "I think, gentlemen of the jury, you will agree with me, that there is no evidence before us worth a straw connecting the prisoners Earle and Edwards with this foul murder, for that murder was done upon the deceased I have no doubt."

The jury agreed with his lordship, and a verdict of "Not guilty" was returned as regarded those two prisoners, and they left the dock.

The judge then summed up the evidence, in a very unfavorable sense to Beecroft. The jury, without hesitation, found him "Guilty." Proclamation was made, Baron Hatsell put on the black cap, and passed sentence of death upon the convicted man—the sentence to be carried into effect, as the custom then was, within forty-eight hours—"And may the Lord have mercy on his sinful soul."

"A soul innocent of murder, my lord!" exclaimed Beecroft in a loud voice. "I am unjustly doomed to death. Sooner or later the truth will be discovered—"

A loud, piercing scream interrupted him, which was found to proceed from Charles Proby, the son of John Proby, the miller. The lad, who might be about eighteen, and was very intelligent for his years and station in life, had been observed by several persons to watch the progress of the trial with restless interest. Having uttered that piercing cry the lad swooned and was borne out into the air. He had been a favorite with Miss Ellen Gay, it was said, which accounted, it was thought, for his great emotion. Not a very logical conclusion that, it seems to me. The incident was soon forgotten.

Five months have passed away since Richard Beecroft, protesting his innocence to the last, was executed; and now the solemn scene which ends this strange eventful history is passing in John Proby's mill. That man's wife is dying—not of age, she can scarcely be forty, but of a broken spirit. No one is in with her but a neighbor woman and a servant. Proby himself is many miles away on business, and Charles Proby, who went out early in the morning, has not returned, though it is growing late. When he left he was not aware of his mother's imminent danger, nor was she herself. Now her anxiety to see him is intense, and messengers have been despatched to hurry his return.

Charles Proby arrives not one minute too soon; the room is cleared, and, strained in his mother's feeble embrace, looked upon with a world of love, of sorrow, remorse, repentance, in her darkening eyes, he hears her say: "Weep not for me, beloved son; rather rejoice that the weary strife for your unhappy mother—unhappy save in your love—will soon be over. Listen, Charles, for I feel my minutes are but few. That cruel man, my wicked husband, specious, godly as he appears before the world, is not your father. Start not—calm yourself; I have been compelled, partly by a sense of shame, partly by his menaces, to conceal this from you. I was sinful in youth—you were not born in wedlock—some money was left me, and I married John Proby. The Clarks, of High street, Leicester, will give you proof of what I say. You can escape the marble-hearted man's thraldom, and—and it—it may be your duty to—I know not. He has said: 'Vengeance is Mine, I will repay.' How cold and dark it grows!" she added, in a scarcely audible voice. "The Clarks of Leicester: Write—no, better go." There was a rattle in the throat, a quivering of the white lips, the flame of an inexhaustible love leaped from the parting soul through the mother's eyes, and with "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," the world-wearied woman sank to rest.

The chief facts concerning Mrs. Proby's death, the manner thereof, and her last words, are extracted from a letter written during the night of his mother's death, to Mr. Ephraim Clark, of Leicester, and a deposition made by Charles Proby, so called. An answer was requested, addressed to the writer, and left to be called for at a friend of the lad's in Lincoln. Charles Proby resolved, during the watches of that solemn night, upon the course he was bound to pursue, but he would first satisfy himself that his mother's words were not the wandering of delirium.

John Proby returned home on the following even, and appeared surprised and affected, in a certain way, by his wife's death; and having heard from the servant of her overpowering anxiety to see and speak with her son, that he arrived in time, and that she insisted on being left alone with him, he became much excited. He insisted upon hearing from the young man what his mother had said, and, not being satisfied with his answers, burst into a violent rage, threatening his son with instant and terrible punishment should he do, or offer to do, anything to displease him. "You know me," he added, "and that my vengeance would be swift and deadly; therefore beware."

Two days after the funeral, Proby was obliged to go to a village, more than twenty miles off, upon business which could not be neglected. Mrs. Proby's son, who had felt himself to be closely watched both by John Proby and his foreman, gave the latter the slip, sped off to Lincoln, found a letter at his mother's friend, a Mr. Rowton, confirming Mrs. Proby's assertion that he was not John Proby's son; and after earnest consultation with Mr. Rowton, and fully comprehending that the accomplice in a murder after the fact, the "aiding and comforting" a murderer, especially when by that "aiding and comforting" an innocent man had met his death at the gallows, was a heinous crime in the eye of the law, he, in company with Mr. Rowton, sought the residence of Mr. Bailey, a county magistrate.

The young man had a terrible tale to tell. Miss Ellen Gay had been murdered, strangled by John Proby. Being so near, she had called at the mill on the night of the 13th of March, no doubt to demand her rent, of which a large sum was due. Everybody, except John Proby himself, had gone, or were going, to bed: he, the deponent, was partially undressed. The men and servant slept in a distant part of the mill. He thought he heard a stifled scream, and partly unclosing the door of his bedroom, which opened upon the room where the miller had been sitting, he was spell-bound with horror at seeing John Proby kneeling by the dead body of Miss Ellen Gay, and detaching her diamond brooch. That he put away in a secret drawer of his bureau, where the young man believed it was still. He then thought for a while, looking on the body, muttering, "It will sink if I strip her of her upper garments," which he did. Then dragging the corpse near a door opening upon the river, he opened it, looked keenly forth, pushed the body into the stream, softly shut the door, returned, and tearing the murdered lady's garments into small strips, burned them one by one. Fearing to be discovered, and believing that if he were, he too should be murdered, the lad, trembling with terror, crept silently back to bed. His face must, next morning, have exhibited signs of the horrors he endured that night, for Proby, eyeing him with suspicion and a stern aspect, asked if he had seen a ghost; and he, deponent, was sure in his own mind that he was always haunted by the fear that his reputed son had witnessed the dreadful deed. He took an opportunity of informing his mother of what he had seen, which threw her into convulsions. In fact, it was her death. She pined away, and was never well afterwards. She, however, as well as her son, lived in such dread of Proby, that she prayed her son to keep the secret close. "He would kill thee, Charles," she said, "he would kill thee too, were he sure thou knowest his crime." After the conviction and sentence of Beecroft, Proby kept saying it was certain his life would be spared, though he would no doubt be heavily punished for the robbery he confessed to; and on the very morning of the execution, returned from Lincoln with, to deponent, the joyful news that the judge, before leaving, had respited the sentence for a month, in order that there might be time to obtain the royal mercy. This was no doubt done to prevent the deponent trampling upon bonds of relationship, and denouncing even his own father, if thereby he might save the life of an innocent man.

Five stout constables, with the reputed son, quietly proceeded to the mill, took the men and servant into temporary custody, in order that nothing should be done, no signal given of the fate which awaited their master, should he return to the mill. Charles Proby, as we may continue to call him, pointed out where he had seen the brooch hidden away; it was found there. One of the constables then marched the lad off to prison, to which he had been committed upon his own confession, as an accessory to the murder after the fact.

John Proby, suspecting nothing, came home in excellent spirits—as the singing, in a louder key than usual, the fag end of a favorite loyal Orange song testified—threw himself off his horse, shouted for the boy to unsaddle and stable him, entered the mill whistling, and in the very room where he had murdered Ellen Gay, was, after a fierce struggle—during which, in his foaming rage, he let fall more than one self-betraying sentence—overpowered, handcuffed, ironed, and safely lodged in jail.

He was tried at the next assizes, where Mrs. Proby's illegitimate son was admitted king's evidence. That evidence, clearly given—corroborated by the finding of the brooch, and the words he let fall in the struggle with the constables—leaving no doubt of his guilt, John Proby was convicted, sentenced to death, and duly hanged. He left the dock, pouring forth awful curses upon the bastard who had wrought his ruin, and died blaspheming.

Ancient Intercourse between England and Iceland.—Before the discovery of Newfoundland, British merchants resorted to ports on the west coast of Iceland, to exchange commodities and procure dried stock-fish. Icelandic ships also visited English ports. This intercommunication can be distinctly traced back to the time of Henry III.; but by the beginning of the fifteenth century it had become regular, and had risen to importance. It was matter of treaty between Norway and England; but, with or without special licenses, or in spite of prohibitions—sometimes with the connivance and permission of the local authorities, and at other times notwithstanding the active opposition of one or both governments—the trade being mutually profitable to those engaged in it, continued to be prosecuted. English tapestry and linen are mentioned in old Icelandic writings, and subsequently we learn that English strong ale was held in high estimation by the Northmen. Edward III. granted certain privileges and exemptions to the fishermen of Blacknie and Lyne, in Norfolk, on account of their Icelandic commerce. In favorable weather the distance could be run in about a fortnight. From Icelandic records we learn that in the year 1412, "thirty ships engaged in fishing were seen off the coast at one time." "In A. D. 1415 there were no fewer than six English merchant ships in the harbor of Hafna Fiord alone." Notwithstanding the proclamations and prohibitions both of Eric and Henry V., the traffic still continued to increase; and we incidentally learn that in the year 1419, "twenty-five English ships were wrecked on this coast in a dreadful snow storm." Goods supplied to the natives then, as in later times, were both cheaper and better than could be obtained from the Danish monopolists. It will be remembered by the reader, that when Columbus visited Iceland he sailed in a bark from the port of Bristol.—"Pen and Pencil Sketches of Faroe and Iceland."

Suicides.—At the recent funeral of a suicide at Scone, Scotland, some forty women endeavored, by persuasion and threats, to cause the body to be lifted over the graveyard wall instead of being carried through the gate. The reason for this is supposed to be, that in the event of the body being allowed to pass through the gate, the first bride "kirked" thereafter will commit suicide within a very short period after her marriage; and that the first child carried to church to be christened will commit suicide before it reaches the age of eight years.

THE SAILOR'S CONSOLATION.

ONE night came on a hurricane,
The sea was mountains rolliug,
When Barney Buntline turned his quid,
And said to Billy Bowling:
"A strong norwester's blowing, Bill;
Hark! don't you hear it roar now:
Lord help 'em, how I pities all
Unhappy folks on shore now!

"Foolhardy chaps who live in towns,
What danger they are all in,
And now lie quaking in their beds,
For fear the roof shall fall in.
Poor creatures! how they envy us,
And wishes, I've a notion,
For our good luck in such a storm,
To be upon the ocean.

And as for those who're out all day
On business from their houses,
And late at night are coming home,
To cheer their babes and spouses;
While you and I, Bill, on the deck
Are comfortably lying,
My eyes! what tiles and chimney-pots
About their heads are flying!

"And very often have we heard
How men are killed and undone
By overturn of carriages,
By thieves and fires in London.
We know what risks all landsmen run,
From noblemen to tailors;
Then, Bill, let us thank Providence
That you and I are sailors!"

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF SONDERBORG.

"NO, no; it may not be, Rolf. This is no time for marrying or feasting."

"And why not, my good mother? We have waited heaven knows long enough. And did you not promise that on my return from my last voyage from New York that Margaret should be mine?"

"True, my son, I did promise, but all human promises you know are conditional. Then I did not forsee—indeed, how should I?—that old Denmark should be engaged in a life and death struggle. Wait, my son—wait until the Germans are driven back beyond the Eider; an event, if it pleases Heaven and every Dane does his duty, which will not be long in coming to pass."

"I hope so, mother; but I cannot see how my marriage with your daughter can have the effect of prolonging the stay of the Germans; and I have yet to learn that a man who has a beautiful true-hearted wife to protect, cannot fight the enemies of his country as stoutly as the bachelor, who has no such sweet incentive to his valor."

"All very well, my son; but you see it is quite out of the question that the wedding should take place at preseut. There the Germans are pounding away at Duppel, whicb may be taken at any moment. And then, you see, there is but a few yards of sea between them and Sonderborg, which, as Frederick tells me, may, at any moment, be bombarded and burnt from the Prussian position."

"Oh, nonsense, mother! Duppel is not so easily taken; and as for tbe bombardment of Sonderborg, here is Frederick and he will tell you that such a thing is never done without some forty-eight hours' notice—plenty of time to get tbrough a much more ceremonious wedding than Margaret's and mine is destined to be."

The foregoing conversation took place between Dame Aagard the honest and well-to-do widow of Simon Aagard, and the mother of the buxom, blue-eyed, golden-haired Margaret, the betrothed for many years of the brave and hardy seaman, Rolf Molbech.

Frederick, the widow's only son, and Margaret's brother, who had just returned from doing duty in the trenches, on being appealed to, confirmed Rolf's statement, declaring that it was quite out of the question that Sonderborg should be bombarded witbout forty-eight hours' notice; that the Prussians, though decidedly wrong in making war on old Denmark, were a highly philosophical and civilized people, and never would be guilty of raining shot and shell upon a town filled with women and children, aged and bedridden, until notice had been given and ample time allowed for the removal of all the helpless and non-fighting portion of the inhabitants. Besides, Frederick could not see of what earthly use the bombardment and destruction of Sonderborg would be to the Germans so long as Duppel remained untaken; for with that position in their possession, the Danes would still be masters of the strait separating the Island of Alsen from the mainland; and though Sonderborg should be reduced to ashes, Alsen would still have numerous positions which could be occupied by the Danes, and defended for months against any force which the Germans could bring against the island. Tbe end of it was, that what with the assurances of her son backing the importunity of her would-be son-in-law, the old lady was prevailed upon to consent to the immediate marriage of her fair danghter Margaret to the gallant and ardent Rolf.

The clergyman, on due representation made, agrees to tie the nuptial knot, a few select friends are invited, and the fair Margaret and the brave Rolf are declared to be husband and wife.

* * * * * * *

It was midnight on the 2d of April. The small, nnfortified town of Sonderborg was steeped in almost perfect repose. Tbe sentries had been posted for the night. There was a complete cessation of hostilities of several hours' duration. The fierce bombardment and repeated assaults to which Duppel had been for the last three days subjected had failed, and the two antagonists. as if by mutnal though a tacit agreement, had rested from the work of slaughter. No hostile missive, unless it might be a stray shot from the Prussian batteries, had hitherto crossed the narrow strait of the Alsensund. Sleep had sealed the eyelids of the peaceable and industrious inhabitants of Sonderborg.

But an instantaneous shock awakes the slumberers from their repose. Windows are lifted and doors are opened, and men and women hastily clothed—many of them in their night dresses—are pouring out and rushing into the streets. The whole town is in a state of sudden commotion. Troops are marching, artillery and amuunition wagons are rattling along the streets. The thunder of cannon is reverberating within the vault of heaven, and the blackness of night is furrowed and flicked with the fiery trail of red-hot sbells, which with lightning's speed come hissiug and screaming across the strait, throngh the murky sky over the city. There is no mistaking the cause and meaning of this terrible scene. Sonderborg is being bombarded. Yes, and witbout the warning which among all civilized nations it is customary to give for the removal of the infirm and the aged, the women and the children.

For the first few minutes it was obvious that the Prussian batteries had not taken correct aim at the city, for their missiles passed over the place. But this error was soon rectified, and shot and shell descended like an infernal hailstorm on the roofs of the houses, and in the streets, squares, and courts of the devoted town. Thicker and faster fall the remorseless messengers of murder. The midnigbt sky is seamed by the red track of innumerable shells, and the strait and harbor catch a lurid illumination from the fiery storm which rages above. Terror seizes the inhabitants. Short shrieks and agonizing cries are heard, but the prevailing characteristic of those bewildered people is a deep and dreadful silence. Half-naked mothers rushed forth with their babes clinging to their breasts. Old and bedriddeu mothers and fathers, were borne in the pious arms of sons and daughters from burning houses to places of supposed, or rather hoped for, safety. Every man and woman who can render help of any kind is bent on some humane deed. No one has time or inclination to bestow upon another's work, each having his or her own self-allotted task to perform.

But all at once the general attention is diverted by a heart-piercing shriek which issued from an unroofed and burning tenement. Before the cause of this cry of anguish could be ascertained. a partially dressed young man, bearing a snow-white burden in his arms, is seen emerging from the flaming honse. It was Rolf Molbech, husband of a few hours, bearing the mangled form of his beauteous bride. A shell had fallen upon and pierced the roof, and exploded in the nuptial chamber. A fragment of the infernal missile had entered the left side of the happy bride as she slept in the arms of her husband. The shriek which had startled the street was her awaking and her expiring cry. Over her snowy bridal robes the warm heart's blood now streamed forth a crimson tide. Such is but one of the horrors of a town bombarded without notice; such is but one of the results of a crime as black as ever was perpetrated—a crime which will inevitably consign its authors to the everlasting execration of the whole human race. We thus see that in ferocious and fiendish cruelty hordes of enfrenzied savages may be excelled by a nation of phlegmatic philosophers, and the lowest and blackest barbarian has, in the hellish art of devilish malignity, something to learn from the most developed and advanced form of so-called "Christian" civilization.

PARISIAN AUTHORS.

THE Paris correspondent of the Publisher's Circular gossips pleasantly about some noted Parisian authors. Edmnnd About, it seems, is to be married to a lady both wealthy and noble—a daughter of Baron de Guillerville, of the Chateau de Roucherolles, near Rouen. His companions are yellow with envy at his good fortune. The correspondent says:

M. About, despite his marriage, is busy, as nsual, with his pen. He contributes an article every month to the Nouvelle Revue de Paris, he writes the criticism on the Exhibition of Paintings in Le Petit Journal, and. it is whispered, he is one of the weekly contributors to La Vie Parisienne. His last work, Le Progrés, is selling better now than it promised at first to do. Since I mention Le Petit Journal, let me mention its success. It is a small sheet, printed on four sides without advertisements; (at least with very few advertisements;) it does not touch on politics; it is sold for one sou; 120,000 copies are sold daily, and the newsmen or newswomen (for the other sex very properly supplies us with the gossip of the world) tell me that, let them lay in ever so great a number, their stock is exhausted before noon. I am amused wheu I remain on the Boulevard, (where they do triple duty—as shelter to the newswomen, as wall for bills, and as lanterns—they are made of glass—to light the thoroughfare,) looking over the publications of the day, to see the incessant calls for this diminutive sheet. Hackmen, marketwomen, policemen, soldiers, even the sewersmen, lay down their sou as they call for the paper which gives them full particulars of the last calf heard of as having three heads, and the last drunkard who fell from a sixth-story window without so much as an abrasion of skin, and the last exploit of the lightning, together with the omnipresent feuilleton, which seems to be the salt necessary to give savor to the periodical porridge. This sheet belongs to M. Millaud, the once famous partner of M. Mires, aud it is raising him to affluence again. He employs the best pens to contribute to his feuilleton and varieties. I told you M. About writes the criticism on the Art Exhibition, M. Leo Lespes (under the pseudonym "Timothée Trim") writes the review of the day; M. Louis Jourdain, of Le Siecle, aud M. Alexandre Dumas are among its contributors. His rate of compensation is one centime and a quarter each letter. A centime is two of your mills; there are five centimes in a sou, which is equivalent to your cent. In old times the custom in the press was to pay so much a line. But M. Alexandre Dumas introduced into his novel, Les Mousquetaires, which first appeared in the feuilleton of La Presse, a character whose whole conversation consisted of "Yes," "No," "Well," "Ah," "But," and "What;" and the public found Grimaud, the valet of Athos, a very amusing personage. At that time poor Dujarrier (who was killed in the famous Dujarrier and Beauvallon's duel) was the manager of La Presse, and it irked him to pay twelve sous a line for lines which contained only one monosyllable. One day he went to M. Dumas, and said: "My dear Dumas, your Grimaud is too silent by half. Make him more loquacious or consent to change our agreement, for it is not fair that his monosyllables be paid at the rate of a whole line. Let us divide the column into two equal spaces, and every line which does not exceed the centre shall pass for nothing." M. Dumas replied: "My dear fellow, if you insist upon it that half lines shall not pay so much as whole lines, I shall make no objection. But. then, you can't expect me t make you a present of the half lines. There are two letters in 'No,' and four letters in 'What;' I cannot give them to you." "My dear Dumas, your observation is just; therefore, let us cancel our old agreement and pay so much each letter." M. Alexandre Dumas accepted, and henceforth the rule was established to pay by the letter instead of by the line. Grimaud, having ceased to earn twelve sous by a mere stroke of the pen, disappeared from the scene until the day the author sentenced him to death. Before I quit this subject, which was fertile in angry discussions between those Mr. and Mrs. Caudle authors and publishers, I must relate an anecdote of Charles Nodier. He, even more than most authors, was always hard pressed for money, and was fond of resorting to all sorts of expedients to make his page contain as few words as possible. One day he had a dispute with the editor of La Revue de Paris, who paid by the line, and who fonnd Nodier's lines excessively short. Failing to make any impression on Nodier, he at last said: "Well, I agree to pay you the spaces, but I'll be switched if I'll pay you your signature for a whole line." "Agreed!" exclaimed Nodier, drawing a pen through his signature as he spoke. "What are you doing?" "You said you would not pay my signature; that it was not worth a whole line. I efface it. I don't care to see my signature at the foot of the article." This, as you may easily imagine, did not suit the editor, and he ever afterwards found Charles Nodier's signature cheap at the price of a single line. A new newspaper has just been published with a feuilleton of twelve hundred lines. The editor annonnces that he will give twenty sous a line for first-rate works. He says he has 90,000 subscribers already, and consequently this rate of remuneration he can easily afford, as it would not cost him above one centime a copy of the paper.

M. Alex. Dumas has definitively adopted the swallow's habits. He makes Paris his home only during the summer months. When winter comes he hies to warmer regions. He has leased a palace at Sorrento, which will be his future winter home. M. Alex. Dumas' (Jr.) play has disappeared from the bills of the Gymnase; but the manager is not altogether dissatisfied with the harvest. It is said that some $25,000 or $30,000 were taken at the doors. The author received $5,000 or $6,000 from the theatre, and he is receiving a good copyright from his publisher, who is selliug the printed piece as fast as he conld desire The public prefer it as a closet piece. The court went to see it played, and the Emperor expressed his satisfaetion with it, saying, "It is prodigiously full of talents." All this ought to be efficacious balm for the wounds the critics and the short rnn of the play gave its author. Nevertheless, he talks of abandoning tbe stage. He has embarked on a steam vessel-of-war, commanded by one of his friends, intending to spend the next few—or many (he does not know which)—months, cruising about the Mediterranean, wherever his friend's duties may call him. He said, to excuse his flight: "I am tired to death of the sympathy of the people who condole with me for the miscarriage of my last piece. It seems to me every man, woman and child in Paris have said to me: 'I really cannot nnderstand why your last play had not the success of its predecessors; it is brilliant as can be.'" The play has already reached a third edition, although it has been withdrawn from the play-bills. I meutioned, in a recent letter, the conjugal troubles of his sister. She has sent a pieture, signed Marie Alexandre Dumas, to the Exhibition of Paintings now open, which all the critics are praising. I have not yet been able to discover it.

M. Ch. Brainne died a few days since in the insane asylnm where he had been confined. He was a professor in the college at Orleans, but upon being ordered to proceed to the college at Alençon, he resigned, came up to Paris, and took service in the press. It is said that his letter of resignation was brief and a pun: "Point d'Alençon," he wrote to the Minister of Public Instruction. M. Jules Lecomte is dead. He was for many years the chief Paris correspondent of the Independance Belge, and was for the last seven years the writer of the Courier de Paris in Le Monde Illustrée. He was the author of some sixty or seventy volumes of novels, travels or plays. Murray commends in his Handbook to Northern Italy, the deceased's work on Venice, but his books are unreadable; they lack style, information, and animation; they are disfigured by the most disagreeable concetti, by want of delicacy, and by ridiculous air. His life, fully and impartially written, would be a stinging satire upon French society, and upon a class of literary men here. The early part of his career lies under thick clouds. His whole life was tainted by grievous faults. Although he was a member of the Dramatic Authors' Society and of the Literary Men's Society, no deputation from either of them appeared at his funeral, and no farewell speech—an honor denied not to the humblest comrade—was made by either of them over his remains. Just indignation has been raised by this their contumely. Were he an unworthy brother of the literary fraternity he should have been treated as such at the balloting, when he was alive and might have defended himself, not at the grave when he was helpless. He was repeatedly engaged in duels. He was fond of announcing that he had for the last fifteen or twenty years daily kept a journal of all he heard and saw in the drawing-rooms of Paris. It will not immediately be published, or. if it does appear, it will be curtailed of all those anecdotes which are unpardonably indiscreet while the hero of them still lives. How short-lived are writers for the Press! MM. Emile de Girardin, Eugene Guinot, A. Peyrat, Ch. Leymarie, H. Rigault, Paul d'Ivoi, Ch. Brainne, Jules Lecomte, and many another in France, Dr. Phillips (the literary critic of the Times,) Bayle St. John, Thackeray. and others in England avouch the heavy draughts made by the press upon them who minister at its ephemeral altars.

DR. WATT'S DAUGHTER.—Miss Watt, the only surviving child of the greatest British bibliographer, Dr. Watt, died lately at Glasgow in a workhouse. Last year a petition was presented to Lord Palmerston for a grant of £100 a year for her benefit. It was signed by Alfred Tennyson, John Ruskin, Thomas Carlyle, George Grote, Sir Frederick Madden, Holman Hunt, Mrs. Gaskell and many another name of note. An answer to it was promised in February, but none came till last week, some days after the death of the poor lady had been announced to one of the Premier's secretaries. Then a fellow-secretary wrote to ask if Miss Watt could be supported on £50 a year; if so. that sum might probably be given to her. It was well, perhaps, that the offer came to a corpse.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Horological Thought.—You can stop a clock, at any moment, but you cannot stop a watch. The same remark, my brethren, applies to the stopping the talk of a man, and of a woman. He is a great, coarse, ugly machine, but you can silence him. She is a beautiful, fragile, jeweled thing—but she will run on until she stops of herself.

Impatience:—In all evils which admit a remedy, impatience should be nvoided, because it wastes that time and attention in complaints which, if properly applied, might remove the cause.

Pleasure.—Whenever we drink too deeply of pleasure, we find a sediment at the bottom of the cup which embitters the draught we have quaffed with so much avidity.

Manuscripts are occasionally to be met with printed on human skin—they are either Mexican or Peruvian. One of the former is to be met with in the library of Vienna, beautifully executed in colored figures, and a second in the library at Dresden, containing a fragmentary history of the Incas of Peru.

A bill for legalizing the marriage of a man with the sister of his deceased wife, has been read a third time and passed in the Legislative Council of South Australia.

Sewing-Machines.—Of the many inventions and improvements of sewing-machines, none have so satisfactorily stood the test of time and service as Grover & Baker's. They have taken the highest premiums at the recent State Fairs of fifteen States; they have, moreover, received the warmest encomiums from all persons who have ever used the machines, and those who have had opportunities to compare the different styles of machines, generally prefer Grover & Baker's to any other. They do the work neatly and well, do not get out of order, and are readily adapted to any kind of sewing. We would advise our lady readers, who are in want of a sewing-machine, to call at Grover & Baker's.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following are the notices which appear in our city cotemporaries:

The Californian.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the Californian is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest publication known to us. The Californian is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

The Californian.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call. June 19th.

The Californian.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The Californian impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the Californian it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

The Californian, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

The Californian.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-bred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

The Californian.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

The New Weekly Review.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The Californian (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the Californian. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the Californian every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

The Californian.—A new candidate for public favor, in the shape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to conduct such a journal with credit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

The Californian.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the Californian—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the Californian. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the Californian will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

California literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the Californian, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

The Californian.—We have been favored with a copy of the Californian, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

The Californian.—This new Saturday newspaper, owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

The first number of the Californian, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The Californian contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

And the following we clip from the exchanges which have reached us:

The Californian.—We have received the second number of the new hebdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under the above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The high literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgment displayed in its selections, and its neat typographical execution, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

The Californian.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the Californian acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union May 30th.

The Californian is the title of a large and neatly printed weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" the first number from our table before we had examined it; the second number, however, is before us, and we find it filled with reading matter, original and selected, of the highest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured that they will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

The Californian.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the Californian will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

The Californian.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

The Californian.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attainments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. The journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the Californian appears to be, and if the publisher will send us his journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

The Californian.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best bow on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

The Californian.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first number of The Californian, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat and plain in typography, and gives evidence of the best of editorial talent.—Placerville Weekly News.

The Californian is the name of a new weekly literary paper which is to make its début in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the business affairs of his journal properly, it is sure to succeed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, DR. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be heated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

FOR GIRLS,

Nos. 64, 66, 68 and 70 SILVER STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

MRS. M. B. SWEDENSTIERNA, PRINCIPAL.

TWELFTH SESSION,

Commencing August 8th, 1864.

THIS INSTITUTION IS DESIGNED TO AFFORD FACILities for the education of girls, fully equal to those furnished at the best Seminaries of the Atlantic States. The course of study is unusually comprehensive, embracing all the branches that the best modern authorities have thought could be advantageously incorporated in the most enlarged scheme of Female Education. In the Collegiate Department it includes the higher mathematics; a course of English Literature and Criticism, taught by a method not elsewhere pursued; Natural History; the Physical Geography of the Pacific Coast; Critical and Universal Grammar; Ecclesiastical History; and the modern applications of Physical Science.

The organization of the School into departments and graded classes, facilitates the pursuit of a regular and systematic course of study. No pupil is permitted to take up the higher branches until thoroughly grounded in the preparatory ones. In the advanced classes, the instruction is to a great extent independent of text-books; and in no case is "going through the book," considered equivalent to "finishing a study."

Calisthenics, consisting of the wand-exercise, etc., take place in the gymnasium daily, from 12 to 12 1-2 o'clock.

Parents, guardians, and others interested in the thorough education of girls, are invited to call and witness for themselves the methods of instruction pursued, the general organization of the school, and its daily workings, which furnish a more reliable test of the excellence of such institutions, than any public examination. No particular "visiting days" have been appointed, the Principal and teachers being gratified by the attendance of visitors, at their daily recitations, at any time and without unusual preparation. Such visits do not in any way interrupt or interfere with the regular routine.

Registers containing full particulars as to the course of study, terms, regulations, etc., can be obtained upon application by mail, or to the Principal personally, at the Seminary. jy16-tf

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

IMPLORA PACE.

DO you hear the church-bell ring,
Till it thrills the slender grasses?
Do you see the church-door swing,
As a gay train slowly passes?
In its daisy-planted yard,
Where many a grave-stone glistens
Can you see her sobbing hard,
As she turns—and looks—and listens?
She was young, and fond, and fair,
He had made her sad life sunny;
But he spread the spoiler's snare,
Mingling poison with the honey.

He is in a costly pew,
By a robe of satin kneeling;
She is underneath the yew,
In an agony of feeling—
Praying peace for her poor soul,
Craving pity for her weakness.
Hark! is that the organ's roll?
She is praying now for meekness,
For the stately figures pass—
His, so haughty and unheeding—
While she crouches in the grass
With her lone heart torn and bleeding.

Now she hears the loitering crowd
Gossip of the wealthy marriage,
Sees the judge—resplendent—proud,
Hand his rich bride to her carriage;
Oh, the odorous orange flowers!
And the white veil all a-flutter;
Oh, the golden, golden hours!
Sweet with words that he can utter;
But, alas! the bitter past,
Change, and woe, neglect—unkindness,
And the waking at the last,
From the fearful, fatal blindness.

Wearily the day goes out,
Like a faintly flickering taper;
Shadowy figures glide about,
Ghost-like, in the thickening vapor;
Great fogs spread their spectral damps;
Hoarse waves bellow through the narrows;
From afar the city's lamps
Shoot their light like silver arrows;
Wolfish storm-winds snarl and prowl,
Filling her sick heart with terror,
For their dismal voices howl
Ever, ever of her error.

Do you hear the angry bay
As the eerie twilight darkens?
What its mad waves seem to say,
As she bends her ear and hearkens?
"Thou shalt find a peaceful rest
On the dark sea's heaving bosom,
As upon thy grief-torn breast,
Went to rest thy baby-blossom;
And God's angels never ask
Of a sin, or frailty human,
Ere they do their holy task,
Is it man? or is it woman?"

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, August 6th, 1864.

I OBSERVE by late despatches that mines have been bringing people to grief in Virginia as well as in this State. That mining operation of Graut's before Petersburg was very well planned, but the suddenness of the rise and fall in things must have puzzled even those who were conversant with the movement.

There has been nothing in this market to equal it.

At first accounts, I was prepared to sing the pæan of victory and rejoice; but subsequent details lead me to doubt the complete success of the movement. I thought, in the first blush of news, that Grant could improve on the old despatch: "We have met the enemy, and he is ours," by writing laconically to the Department at Washington: I have met the enemy, and he is Mine; but, alas, no! As has been my own experience, this mine of ours hoisted its friends quite as high as it did its enemies.

If I had known that Grant contemplated any operation of the kind I could have been of material assistance to him. For I know of a mine or two that would have made the gay and festive rebels tremble in their shoes. Supposing he had tucked a little Lady Bryan under them, or introduced a few shares of Santiago into the bill, does any one imagine that the whole rebel command would not have gone up on that warm July morning?

They would have been cleaned out of houses and homes and all their estate, real and personal. In their poverty and shame they would have had to become corner-brokers, perhaps.

Will they supersede Grant now because he has proven less successful at the East as a Miner-General than he did at the West as a Major one? It wouldn't surprise me much if they did, for such is the fate of all popular heroes. One moment the multitude are swinging their greasy caps in the air in honor of a man, and the next moment he is himself swinging in the air a victim to their caprice. Popular fame may very well be defined by a couplet which comes to my mind—it is from De Caux, I think:

C'est un verre qui luit
Qu'un souffle peut detruire et qu'un souffle a produit.

It is a great mistake to think that the majority are always in the right. They were not so in the matter of the Flood—it was a comfortable thing to be in the minority then—and they've been wrong several times since.

Ah, my friends, there was terrible work before Petersburg! One can write very flippantly of the war, seated here some thousands of miles away from it, but it is a very different thing to be charging on works that blaze with a fire which cuts down your ranks as the reaper's blade does the nodding grain. It is little wonder that the poor negroes wilted and withered and crept coweringly under cover. Why was not white valor put in the front on an occasion like that?

The question has been repeatedly asked: What shall be done with the negro? We will be spared its solution if there are many repetitions of that programme.

Early, they say, is in the Shenandoah Valley with his command, harvesting the wheat and threshing it out. Some way, these rebels seem to be around where they have no business to be, both early and late, and I much wish the stout yeomen of the Pennsylvania border would leave off looking for petroleum oil and go down and thresh them out from the valley. The only way that I can account for the rebel raiders getting away from Pennsylvania before is by supposing that they slipped through the oily fingers of the farmers.

Never mind; we may be hare-pie yet, as the rabbits said. The same Providence that shapes our ends will perhaps shape and end to the war, soon. I shall travel on that shape when it comes.

In the meanwhile I try to turn my attention to the pleasant pursuits of peace. I know a Bank whereon the terrapin grows, and I go there occasionally, and seat myself on a terrapin-cushion, and show the boys how the game of nine-pins, or nine terrapins, is played.

"Deal gently with the erring one," is the kindly sentiment inculcated by the song; but I'm not an erring one, it seems—at least I never won yet. Apropos: I trust the authorities at Alcatraz will not be seduced into any little game where proils count, but fulls beat them, with the gentleman who is now visiting them. For if they are, he will capture the Fort, certain.

People must do something for amusement, though, and the town is dull enough at best. My principal fun of late has consisted in seeing the charming little comic operas that the English troupe are now producing at the Academy of Music. The Doctor of Alcantara pleased me more than anything that has been produced here for some time. The plot is nothing to speak of; but I'm tired of plots—the world is too full of them already. The music is delicious, the acting excellent. I had some curiosity to see that "wonderful organ" of Peakes', which the critic of THE CALIFORNIAN has so often mentioned, leading the public erroneously to suppose that he traveled around the stage like an itinerant Italian. This Peakes, by the way, must not be confounded with the proprietor of the Peakes' Medical Institute, for he is quite another man, comes from a totally different family, and the two are in no wise related. But if he has no organ he has a splendid bass voice, which reminds us of one.

I am glad the Opera troupe has changed its Base, for I had got rather tired of Gregg, and don't care how soon his bark is on the sea. It is great pity that he, with that fine voice of his, cannot disabuse himself of the idea that every musical note is a rat, and that his special mission on the lyric stage is that of a terrier.

I saw Miss Julia Gould and wondered if she was concerned in the Gould and Curry mine, finally concluding that she was not, since the notes she offered were all legal tender ones—notes, however, which I am willing to endorse.

Criticism is not my department in this paper, but yet I shall take the liberty of saying that I liked everybody in that charming little opera, with the exception of an ugly girl in the chorus who winked at me. It was a case of mistaken identity, I suppose. Probably she thought I was her long lost brother, but I ain't, and she shouldn't do such things. If asked who I liked the most of all in the piece, I should reply, Miss Richings and Miss Kempton. One is a brunette, the other a blonde. My beauty is of the blonde style, what there is of it, but it scarcely produces the effect that Miss Kempton's does. I'm glad of it, for it would be mightily unpleasant to have young men falling in love with me and singing under my window at night.

One thing provoked me about the opera, however, and that was the fact that so few went out to see it. Is San Francisco utterly incapable of appreciating anything, or are its people dead to the truth that they have a duty to perform? If we had no opera there'd be a whine for one, and a wonder why managers didn't bring one out. A manager makes the venture, and here is the result: people stay at home and play dummy-whist, and the manager loses money every night.

Such things provoke me so that if it were possible I'd hand in my checks to-morrow and move to Washington. But Quid Romæ faciam? mentire nescio. What should I do in Washington? I cannot lie; and they don't want any more Major-Generals in the field at present—at least I suppose so from the fact that they have commenced shipping them out here.

I might go to Washoe and get elected Judge, perhaps; according to the newspapers published up there, the office is a lucrative one. They are all finding fault with Judge North. Poor Judge; it is hard to please everybody and get rich at the same time. If he takes my advice he'll get rich first before he tries the other thing. I recollect a phrase in one of the newspapers to this effect: "He has soiled the purity of his ermine." Ermine is probably some cheap cloth that people wear up in the Territory. Or do Judges up there wear ermine to indicate that they are liable to err when mines are concerned in their decisions?

If I were not very tired I'd whisper a few words in the Judge's ear, and tell him how he can shove up a few points on the chaps he's playing with, even at the risk of having it thought that I took an undue interest in the game. But the labors of the week have been exhaustive, and I have only strength to murmur:

May no ghost your slumbers mar,
Good night, Señor Balthazar!

before I turn off the gas and seek that couch where innocence slumbers—but where I generally lie awake all night.

Be virtuous my friends, and perhaps you'll be happy; but if the experiment doesn't work to your satisfaction, be happy anyway, and virtue will follow as a thing of course. This has been the experience of

INIGO.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XIX.

THE Thursday morning which was to be the dawning or the twilight of my life I ordered my horse saddled, so as to arrive at Monthermé before my guardian, to receive the last instructions of Granger. At taking leave of Diana I was much moved:

"Courage!" said she; "I have prayed for you. Let us trust in God."

"Alas!" replied I; "I fear success to-day, for it would oblige me to leave you."

"André, what do you mean? Would you accept happiness at the expense of your dignity? Remember that your fall would touch me in my dearest affection. Be calm and strong, for it concerns your life and my dearest pride."

"But when I shall be far away, what will become of you?"

"I will live on souvenirs," replied she, with a proud melancholy; "and now, my friend, go! and God be with you."

And as I held my hand out to her she drew me towards her and imprinted a kiss on my forehead. I went away quickly, blinded with tears. It seemed to me that the last link with the sweet past was broken. I was doomed to meet sorrow; victory would separate me from her; defeat would lower me even in her eyes, and would reduce me forever to shameful servitude. I flew along, and arrived at Granger's in an hour. I found him occupied as with the approach of serious business. I was not to be present at the family council; my old defender, however, wished to present me to the friends or distant relatives on whom my fate depended. I divined his thought.

"You wish to show them that I am not mad," said I, with a bitter laugh.

A servant came to announce the arrival of several members of the council. We went into the drawing-room. At the silence which followed my entrance I nearly lost countenance. It was easy for me to see that doubts of my sanity had already filled the minds of my judges, and astonishment was visible on each face when I greeted them. I felt their looks weigh on me. They troubled me, and it was necessary to make an extraordinary effort in order to overcome my fear. A word, a gesture, which would have seemed strange in their eyes, and I was lost. By good luck, Granger made a diversion. I became reassured, and spoke of my journey with a freedom of thought which soon overcame all their doubts as to my sanity.

The arrival of M. de Maufert, followed by the Justice of the Peace, completed the council, so I retired. My guardian conducted me to the drawing-room door with every mark of attention, and as if we were the best friends in the world.

Alone in Granger's study, I could not bear the anxiety of waiting. I went out. A short distance from the house I found Bastien:

"The Countess sent me," said he; "she commanded me to wait about here, so as to be ready to serve you, if you had need of any one."

I blessed Diana from the bottom of my heart; she foresaw the sorrow of this hour of loneliness.

"Follow me," said I to him, "and thank you for coming."

And we walked on, without any destination, to kill time.

Bastien tried to divert my thoughts, he chatted at random about everything which surrounded us; but I did not listen. I thought of the dangers of the present hour, I recalled to my mind even the slightest word which I had uttered before these judges, on whom my life depended. Was I at all incoherent? I was frightened.

"Bastien! Bastien!" cried I, "speak to me of Diana!"

He seemed alarmed at this.

"See here, M. André, do not be so much affected by this. All will be well. The Countess told me so in sending me here. She loves you too much for them to dare to harm you."

The cruellest anxieties filled my brain; I began to doubt myself, I searched in the eyes of the passers-by indications of pity; at the corner of the street a young girl turned round and looked at me. I turned pale and felt my courage fail me.

"It seems you have pleased her," said Bastien laughingly; "she is very pretty."

I do not know how long it was that we wandered about, nor what road we went. As we turned into the street where my lawyer lived, I saw M. de Maufert and the other members of the council come out and enter their carraiges. A moment afterwards, I joined Granger.

"Ah, here you are!" said he to me. "I feared you had gone off."

By his tone, I divined a failure.

"Am I condemned!" said I to him.

"No, no" he quickly replied. "How fast you go, Baron! They do not execute people in this way. Your case is neither gained nor lost, it is only adjourned. But sit down there and listen to me."

"I must first tell you," continued he, "that you worked a miracle with those gentlemen. Not having seen you for a year, they were influenced by the calumnies that you know of. Your presence suddenly gained them for you. Your simplicity and calmness were admirable. After your departure, however, the debate was very lively. It was necessary to fire the train and place M. de Maufert in the position either of acquiescing in your request or of refusing it. The Court finished by demanding a medical examination."

At these unexpected words a tremor convulsed me.

"A medical examination!" cried I.

"You must not dissimulate, Baron; but in six months from to-day you will be called to submit to the same ordeal."

"So he has dared to declare me mad!"

"But the council is far from being convinced, as they have rejected the application of your guardian until more ample inquiry has been made."

"And when will I be obliged to submit to this humiliation?"

"The day is not yet fixed. But do not be frightened. It will be sufficient merely to appear before the council who will interrogate you. Two doctors will be present—that is all; and you will have no more trouble to triumph than you had this morning."

I took leave of the notary and rejoined Bastien. I was saddened by the decision of my judges.

"I sent away your horse," said he to me. "The Countess thought you would bring me back, and she sent a carriage."

I returned to Maufert a prey to the most horrible sadness. Half a league from the chateau I saw Diana, who awaited me. I descended precipitately from the carriage, and told the coachman to return without me.

"What has happened?" said she to me, as soon as we were alone.

"He has declared me mad," replied I, with bitter agitation, "and an assemblage of doctors will be called to decide my fate."

"In Heaven's name, calm yourself," cried she to me. "You become despondent when it only depends on you to gain your case."

Hearing her speak, I felt ashamed of myself. The elasticity of my mind was then exhausted in the beginning of the combat! I appealed to my courage to be at least worthy of Diana. I related to her minutely the occurrences of the day. She discussed them, and commented on them with such cheerful confidence, that she alleviated my sorrow. I loved her——

Alas! that my last days of joy should shine in the midst of storm. My sad heart died there. Even the tenderness of Diana was powerless to restore my faith; and a frightful preoccupation, about which I did not dare to speak to her, laid siege to me. How were they going to decide about my life? I could no longer deceive myself; this calumny that I had despised suddenly raised itself before me at my first step, as if to bar me from the world. It was believed by those whom the law charged to protect me. Was I no longer under the protection of common law, that they dared subject me to such a humiliating trial? And this cruel decision of my judges, who feared to declare me insane without a legal trial. Did not this already prove my degradation? If I were vanquished in this terrible fight what would be my fate? If fear should paralyze my mind! Every hour in the day I imagined this very tribunal scrutinizing my face, spying out my thoughts, and penetrating my agony. Was I myself sure of my reason? I who was abandoned to a foolish if not an unholy passion! Even my love became suspicious. Diana divined my sorrow. She interrogated me broken-heartedly. How could I reveal to her such sad struggles? I tried in vain to overcome my cowardly weakness, but these sinister presentiments came every day with more violence. The presence of my guardian was a torture to me. Sour and implacable, one would have said that he saw on my forehead the outline of the terrors which pursued me. I now suspected, by his aggressive humor, that he hoped to force me into some deplorable scene before his servants, and he came very nigh succeeding. But I read in the eyes of Diana such a poignant supplication, that I contained myself. I then remarked with great astonishment a marked change in the demeanor of my godmother. That calm and dignified pride with which she held sway over the Count seemed to have left her. She no longer dared to defend me; and sometimes I fancied I saw her look at her unworthy husband as though she feared he had penetrated the heart of her soul. I then understood I had dragged her down in my fall. From all sides we saw the dark net close around us. If we went into the Park we saw at our heels the little ragged goatherd who once followed Granger to Thilay; and whom Bastien had pointed out to us under the name of Lazarus. In the Park it always happened that we saw Placide rise up before us as though he had been watching us under cover of the bushes, to hear what we were talking about. At first I despised this vile espionage; but soon I began to fear still blacker perfidies. The obsequious smile of the steward betrayed a low irony which I dare not divine. One would have thought he had penetrated the sad secret so deeply hidden in the folds of my heart. So we lived in the midst of ever-recurring terrors, when one morning a letter from Granger, brought by Bastien, informed us that the dreaded day was fixed for the following Monday. I turned so pale at this news that Diana rushed towards me to support me.

"André," said she to me, "do you love nothing in the world that you can thus despair of yourself and of your life?"

I tried to hide my weakness. "Ah," said I, "pardon me for being a coward. But I am terrified at the thought of the exile to which I am condemned, and I ask myself what will I do with my existence separated from you?"

"Separated, André! it is no longer your heart which speaks, —that heart which in the interchange of our brotherly and sisterly affection understands so well the eternity of such affection."

"Only Love works such miracles," said I, sadly.

At this word which escaped my lips Diana made a terrified gesture. I saw her tremble.

"Well," replied she immediately; "let love save you."

"What do you mean?"

"Three months ago," continued she, in a tremulous voice, "you loved, André. I know it, as Madeleine and I drew this avowal from you. You suffered then; are you cured now?"

"No; but she whom I love will never know it."

Her eyes rested on mine with an undefinable expression which troubled me to the bottom of my soul.

"What does it matter if she knows it?" said she. "There are for such loves higher regions where sufferings are blessed by God, who alone sees them."

"That is martyrdom," said I, bitterly.

"Well, be a martyr," said she, with exultation; "but if your hand withers in the tortures of life, let your hand still hold this sacred branch; may your idol remain upright, and may the image invoked in your dreams never turn away from you with contempt!"

"Ah," replied I, "I will be worthy of her. I swear it, and worthy of you."

A cry of joy was her sole reply to this remark. My eyes met hers, and in my vision she seemed transfigured. But suddenly, as if broken down by the effort she tottered, and disengaging herself from my grasp, she covered her face, and, as when she on the mountain spoke of my departure, she burst into tears.

"My dear godmother," said I, "do not weep." In the tumult of my emotion I found no other word to comfort her. I was anguished at the sight of her tears, and at the same time felt proud to have been the object of a friendship so profound that it borrowed from Love all its superb eloquence, its disdains, and its modesty.

"Diana, forget this hour of cowardice," exclaimed I. "Ah, your grief saddens me more than my own distress. For your sake I will vanquish these humiliations and insults; for your sake I will live free and esteemed."

"Yes, it is for me that I pray you," replied she; "for me, who has only your affection."

She implored me, and I felt again awakened in my soul those radiant visions which had already once enshrouded me. "Great God! what blessed name must be given to this harmony of our souls? Is there then above the terrestrial passions a holy tenderness—an unnamed intoxication which the angels alone feel?"

Plunged again in the holy springs of love and faith, I was sincere, and I thought I had regained my strength; but, alas! it was but a flash of lightning through the night. The next day the dim visions which disturbed my dreams came back more furiously than ever. In the disorder of my sleep I lost the little energy I gathered in the daytime, and I noted with terror the discouragement which filled me. My will alone I knew could defend me against the fatal heritage by which I was menaced, and I felt this horrible thought gradually grow in my mind: "Perhaps I am already mad." Then I recalled the numerous cases of madness engendered by tortures of the mind and persecutions, and "They will succeed! they will succeed!" said I to myself.

A nervous fever consumed me. I no longer dared to go out of the chateau; I became savage. A word, a smile, irritated me, and as I had already felt at Montherme some days before, it seemed to me that I was the subject of all the conversation and gossip. One morning as I walked near a spring, the public fountain of the village, some peasants assembled there began to look at me. They suddenly ceased talking at my approach, and I thought they were talking of me. I was intimidated at seeing their curious faces, and hesitated to continue on my way. I do not know whether or not they saw my embarrassment; the old women whispered together.

"What a pity!" said a young girl aloud. I turned back. I was afraid that some peculiarity in my walk would cause remark. Hardly had I gone two steps when I heard a burst of laughter. Indignant at my own pusillanimity I wished to go back, but it seemed to me I heard the touching voice which said, "What a pity!" This word echoed in my ear like a wail and in spite of myself I mechanically repeated, "What a pity, What a pity!"

Until night I was overcome by the horrible thought that all the world knew I was already mad. What a pity! What a pity! Several times Diana was astonished by this phrase which fell involuntarily from my lips, and which to her had no signification. I did not dare to reveal to her my torments, and I tried to appear happy.

"André," said she to me, with a supplicating gesture, "cease, I beg of you. You suffer. I see it; and your gayety saddens me."

At the cost of my life I would have spared her pain. But the fatal mania resisted even my love; the shirt of Nessus burned me. At every hour, at every moment, I said to myself: I am not mad; no, I am not mad. This incessant refrain resounded for ever in my mind, beating upon my brain like a wave on the strand; and the fair image of Diana, which I always carried within me, wept at my martyrdom.

THE greatest glory is not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.

THE OLD STORY.

MY heart is chilled and my pulse is slow,
But often and often will memory go,
Like the blind child lost in a waste of snow—
Back to the days when I loved you so,
The beautiful long ago.

I sit here, dreaming them through and through,
The blissful moments I shared with you—
The sweet, sweet days when our love was new,
When I was trustful and you were true—
Beautiful days, but few.

Blest or wretched, fettered or free,
Why should I care how your life may be,
Or whether you wander by land or sea?
I only know you are dead to me,
Ever and hopelessly.

O, how often at day's decline,
I pushed from my window the curtaining vine,
The gracious sunshine, the patient rain,
Type of a message, that half divine,
Flashed from your heart to mine.

Once more the starlight is silvering all—
The roses sleep by the garden wall—
The nightbird warbles his madrigal—
And I hear again through the sweet air fall
The evening-bugle call.

But summers will vanish and years will wane,
And bring no light to your window-pane—
Nor gracious sunshine nor patient rain,
Can bring dead love back to life again—
I call up the past in vain.

My heart is heavy, my heart is old,
And that proves dross which I counted gold;
I watch no longer your curtain's fold,
The window is dark and the night is cold,
And the story forever told!

THE GOLDEN DONKEY.

THE Rothschilds of Paris, London, Vienna and Naples joined, in the year 1827, in offering a birthday present to the fifth brother, Baron Amschel von Rothschild, who was established at Frankfort, the headquarters of the family. This present was a group of figures, from the atelier of the most renowned goldsmith of the day, and represented a donkey tied at the door of an inn, and laden with a sack. The donkey-driver, who stands close by, is holding up another sack, out of the mouth of which a number of stones are tumbling on the ground. Donkey, sack, driver and stones, are chiselled out of a large block of the purest virgin gold.

An may be supposed, this curious group became the object of many a witticism amongst the laughter-loving Frankforters; but its proprietor seemed to care but little for the numerous jokes which were circulated on the subject, and for a long time the group stood on a marble mantel-piece in one of his splendid saloons. Baron Rothschild ever seemed to take a peculiar pleasure in relating its history, which was nearly this:

Once upon a time, before the discovery of steam-packets, and long before railroads were ever dreamt of, nay, when even those machines miscalled diligences were quite unknown, and carriers' wagons were still in their infancy; in those days, which, be it remarked, are not so far distant from our time of never-ceasing locomotion, the only regular and quick means of communication between Italy and Holland was supplied by a company of frugal and industrious Italians, stationed at intervals along the road, and each of whom kept constantly travelling backwards and forwards with a donkey, for the purpose of transmitting the packages that arrived from one point to another of the route. One of the donkey-drivers, "the subject of the present memoirs," as the phrase is, did a little independent trade on his own account, buying silk stuffs in Strasburg, and transporting them into Westphalia for sale.

In those days of primitive innocence, or ignorance, as the encyclopedists of this generation will probably think them, people knew nothing of either sliding-scales or balances, whether financial or political: indeed, as will be seen by the sequel, the common mechanical doctrines of weight and counterpoise seem not to have been generally understood; at least our donkey-driver must have been perfectly ignorant of it for in loading his beast with a sack of silk goods, which formed his stock in trade, he had recourse to a somewhat unusual expedient for establishing a counterpoise. This was neither more nor less than balancing the silk goods on one side by a sack of stones on the other; thereby procuring for the donkey an equal amount of pressure on both his sides. So long as this process of equilibrizing could be performed at home in the donkey's own stable, and free from the intrusive presence, the chat, and the unasked counsels of officious bystanders, all went well and smoothly, and a proper balance was effected in a short time.

The donkey-driver, on one particular occasion, felt all the unpleasantness of a public performance of this intricate task; he had been obliged to reload his donkey in the open street of a small town on the Lower Rhine, and was soon surrounded by a crowd of idlers, who talked so incessantly, gave so much contradictory good advice, and offered so many opinions on the progress of his work, that at length the poor fellow quite lost his head, and, forgetting what he was about, packed and unpacked, loaded and unloaded, pulled the bag of stones one way, and the bag of silk the other, quite mechanically, and just as he was desired by the lookers-on. At length perceiving the fruitlessness of his endeavors, he sat down on a big stone and burst into a flood of tears to the no small delight of the crowd of idle gamins, who evinced their satisfaction by shouting and dancing round him like a party of American Indians round a prisoner of war. The confusion and noise had just reached its climax, when a respectable-looking man forced his way through the crowd, and demanded the cause of the disturbance. This person understanding the language of the poor Italian, soon ascertained the true state of the case, and took his measures accordingly. He first ordered the stones to be emptied out of the one sack; he then counted the number of parcels in the other, and leaving one half of them just where they were he, transferred the other moiety to the sack which had been previously filled with stones, and then hung one on each side of the pack saddle.

The problem was thus solved, and the burden equally divided to the perfect contentment of the Italian, and the no less satisfaction of the donkey. The farmer took leave of his benefactor with many expressions of gratitude, and proceeded on his journey. On thinking the matter over, it at length struck him that his unknown friend had not only helped him out of his present difficulties, but put him in the way of packing on his donkey, for the future, exactly twice the usual quantity of wares he had hitherto been enabled to carry, and having once arrived at this satisfactory conclusion, he was not slow in drawing the deduction that his profits would be thereby increased in the same ratio. Having once perceived the feasibility of this plan, his Italian love of gain induced him to put it into immediate execution on his subsequent journeys, and he found that it succeeded perfectly to his expectations, and to the realization of a considerable sum of money.

Many months afterwards, the Italian happened to be passing through the same town, and he felt an invincible desire to offer his most grateful thanks to the person whose good advice had brought him so much good luck. He had frequently seen his benefactor at a distance, when passing through the town on previous occasions: he appeared indeed to form no inconsiderable portion of the public. He spent his entire day in lounging up and down the streets, sometimes watching the girls drawing water at the fountain, at others looking at the soldiers at drill in the square before the barracks; sometimes helping the driver of a sulky horse out of a scrape, or picking up some little child that had been upset by a strong pig, or its own scarcely less rude and filthy companions; in fact, always busy, either in observing and treasuring up in his own mind anything interesting that presented itself to his notice, or in helping his neighbors out of their little difficulties.

Now, by good fortune, it so happened on the day in question, that this man was roving about as usual, and the Italian was thereby spared the trouble of seeking him out for the purpose of lightening his conscience by the payment of at least this one debt of gratitude. The donkey-driver, therefore, went up to his benefactor, and, taking off his hat, began in a long and elaborate speech to return thanks, and express his great obligations to the man to whose good advice he was indebted for his present prosperity, protesting all the while, with great fluency, his eternal gratitude. The man replied with much modesty, and expressed his gratification at having been able to serve the Italian; by degrees they got into a long talk together, towards the conclusion of which the donkey-man, encouraged by the kind manners and condescension of his benefactor, plucked up courage, and thought he too would give a piece of good advice in return.

"How comes it," said he, with an expression of astonishment, "that so clever and well-educated a man as you are, to whom, no doubt, many other people besides myself have been indebted for success in their undertakings—how comes it that you do not deign to use your talents and knowledge in your own behalf, and that you do nothing but idle about the streets the whole live-long day, instead of exercising an honorable industry in your own behalf?"

"Yes," replied the man, "true enough, a great deal might be said on that score, and you are not the first person who has put that question to me; indeed, I often wonder at my own idleness myself. But," added he, with a heavy sigh, "I have tried everything, perhaps, in more different ways than most people, but nothing that I ever undertook would prosper with me, be it what it might, The fruits of bitter experience have taught me that it is better for me to put my hands in my pockets and do nothing at all, rather than to continue thus struggling on from bad to worse. In a word, I hav one luck!"

With all the innate delicacy and gentilezza of his countrymen, who possess this in a high degree, the Italian endeavored to soothe the feelings of his benefactor as well as he could; he apparently succeeded in so doing, for the stranger listened to his expressions of sympathy with a kind and grateful smile, and after a while they parted from one another with many mutual protestations of friendship and regard.

The itinerant silk merchant drove his donkey out of the gate of the town in what may be called a brown study. Poets, historians, and novelists possess an admirable faculty of guessing other people's thoughts, and they can tell with wonderful precision the exact idea that sat on the pineal gland of their hero at the very moment that the deadly bullet came whizzing through his brain and destroyed its delicate organization. I do not pretend to belong to either of these distinguished human categories, and I confess myself to be utterly incapable of divining anybody's thoughts; indeed my own are sometimes so unintelligible as to puzzle myself; furthermore, I am by no means desirous of imposing on your credulity, gentlemen, and I have confined myself in this narrative to a statement of the facts as I have been told them myself. Nevertheless, I am enabled to tell you accurately, or very nearly so, what the Italian thought to himself, while he made his exit from the gates of the town, immersed in the above-recited brown study; simply because he subsequently recounted to a friend of his, not only his entire train of thought on the occasion, but also the whole course of action which resulted from it.

"I found myself," said he, on the one hand, penetrated with the liveliest sentiments of regard and affection for my benefactor, whilst, on the other hand, his confession 'that he had no luck,' sounded in my ears like the ill-omened screech-owl. 'Thou hast no luck,' said I, 'then thou canst not give advice that will bring luck!' With this reflection I ended my soliloquy, and immediately retraced my way to the little town I had just left."

Our hero had a mercantile acquaintance in that town, to whom he immediatly went, offering him for sale the contents of one bag of silk goods. The merchant purchased it from him at a tolerably fair rate, and within a quarter of an hour afterwards he was on his road to Westphalia again, with but one bag of silk, which he supported on the donkey's pack-saddle with his hand as well as he could. He soon after came to a large quarry on the roadside, into which he turned to fill his empty sack with broken fragments, according to his old practice. It was towards evening and the quarry men had left off work, so that, having the whole quarry to himself, and no one either to look or to give him advice, he contrived within a reasonable time to establish a little equilibrium on the donkey's back. He then proceeded on his journey, and arrived at Munster without meeting any further adventure.

Now, it so happened that the news of the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle arrived at Munster a day or two before our itinerant silk merchant. But you will ask what the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle had to do with so humble an individual? Much, my friends, as you will presently see; for the silk trade through Holland was thereby re-opened, and the price of silk goods fell exactly one half in consequence; in fact, the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle was as fatal to the donkey-driving, itinerant Italian silk-merchant, as was Vasco de Gama's discovery of the Cape of Good Hope to the Seignoria of Venice; much more so, for its fatal operation was much more rapid. What was he to do—warehouse his goods for a while, and try whether the market might not improve again? This was beyond his means; and, besides, it was very doubtful whether there might not in the meantime be a further decline in prices. He therefore said to himself:

"The first loss is always the best; and I will sell my silks for whatever they may bring; it is fortunate that I have only half the usual quantity."

Seeing, under all the circumstances of the case, no probability of ever being able to carry on his trade, with any chance of realizing reasonable profits, and thereby recover his present losses, he determined on getting rid of his entire travelling equipage, and turning himself to some other means of gaining a livelihood. He began, first of all, with the bag of stones, which he proceeded to empty out on the ground, not expecting to realize any great profit from that part of his traps. As he turned it up and let its contents roll out on the pavement, some of the passers-by stopped to see what he was doing.

"Where did you get those pieces of marble?" said one. "I will give you five dollars for them."

The Italian was on the point of saying "done," but being a slow speaker, he fortunately had no time to edge in that monosyllable, before another shouted out—

"I'll give ten dollars."

"And I forty," said a third.

At length, the last bidder bought the lot for a hundred dollars. This was about the amount of the poor fellow's loss on his bag of silk goods, whereas he would have lost double that sum without having the slightest chance of making it good again, if he had not known the right moment for acting against the advice of "the clever man who had no luck."

Old Rothschild used often to tell this story to his five sons, and say: "Take warning by this example, and when you come hereafter to do business on your own account, avoid those who have talents without luck."

The sons remembered this saying, and when they had thriven well in the world, they resolved on typifying the adage that "luck rules the world," by the above-mentioned "golden donkey."

TURNING THE TABLES NICELY.

WOMEN, like loaded firearms, are dangerous things to trifle with. A French paper furnishes us with an additional instance of the uselessness of attempting to distance one of them, so far as practical advantages are concerned:

Mons. P——, an old soldier of stern and unyielding disposition, decided to marry his son to the daughter of a companion-in-arms. The young man had conceived other projects, and contracted another engagement. But, through excessive timidity, poor Arthur did not dare openly to resist the commands of his father, whose first words had been so brutally overwhelming, that he passed all the time between the engagement and the wedding doing nothing but sighing deeply. Mlle. Emma L. took his melancholy for classic symptoms of love, and began to adore him more than ever. On the morning of the wedding, they repaired to the home of the magistrate; Arthur was sad, reserved, and seemed to have formed some desperate resolution. Emma was in raptures.

Monsieur, the Mayor of C——, the preliminaries being over, addressed the bridegroom the customary question:

"Arthur P., do you consent to take Emma D. for your wife?"

Arthur slowly raised his head, and in a voice choked by emotion, but full and resolute, replied:

"No!"

General excitement, scandal and scenes of confusion prevailed. They separated in disorder, the indignant parents demanded an explanation from M. P., the father, who seemed struck with apoplexy. As for Arthur, he escaped and left for Paris.

Some days after, a young lady ascended the stairs of a furnished hotel, in the Rue St. Honoré. She had inquired of the porter for M. Arthur P., who had arrived the evening previous. It was Emma come to Paris with her father and M. P., in search of her affianced who had so shamefully insulted her; but she was alone now. She rapped at the door of No. 17, and entered without waiting for an answer. The young man was lying down reading a newspaper. Emma walked directly to the bed, and drawing from under her shawl an enormous horse-pistol, which doubtless she had stolen from her father:

"Sir," said she, to Arthur, her eyes flashing fire, "you have insulted me; I demand satisfaction; that satisfaction I exact, pistol in hand. Let us return to the Mayor of C——, both in wedding attire; he will put to you the usual question; you will say 'yes,' I will say 'no.'"

Emma brandished her pistols in both hands. It was an argument. But, after all, it was only her right, or nearly so; at least, such was Arthur's opinion. He consented, and left the same evening with his father, who gnashed his teeth all the way. They appeared again before the Mayor—the same magistrate. Arthur boldly answered "yes," and prepared his countenance, always bashful enough, in order to hear the reply of his betrothed.

The Mayor continued: "Emma L., do you consent?" Emma answered "YES," in the most natural tone imaginable.

M. P., the father, is delighted, and feels assured that a union commenced under such circumstances will end in a fairy tale!

Our lovely time of youth is our Italy and Greece, full of gods temples, and bliss—and alas! that so often Goths and Vandals stalk through and strip them with their talons.

Good will, like a good name, is got by many actions, and lost by one.

OF ONE WHO FELL IN BATTLE.

H. A. G., JUNE 30, 1864.

By smoke-encumbered field and tangled lane,
Down roads whose dust was laid with scarlet dew,
Past guns dismounted, ragged heaps of slain,
Dark moving files, and bright blades glancing through,
All day the waves of battle swept the plain
Up to the ramparts, where they broke and cast
Thy young life quivering down, like foam before the blast.

Then sank the tumult. Like an angel's wing,
Soft fingers swept thy pulses. The west wind
Whispered fond voices, mingling with the ring
Of Sabbath bells of Peace—such peace as brave men find,
And only look for—till the months shall bring Surcease of Wrong, and fail from out the land
Bondage and shame, and Freedom's altars stand.

LOYALTY OF THE "ALTA" AND "BULLETIN."

IT has been repeatedly asserted that the Alta and Bulletin are not loyal, but that on the contrary they worked in the rebel interest at the first, and are still at heart in sympathy with the rebellion. This charge has been so pertinaciously made that some persons believe it true, while others think it at least leaves room for suspicion. The charge is a serious one, and worthy of serious consideration. For if true, these journals are unworthy the support of a loyal community, and the sooner it is withdrawn from them the better. If, on the other hand, the charge be false, it should not be entertained to their discredit. The purpose of the present article is to consider the accusation and examine it in the light of facts and the records of the journals themselves.

To commence with the Alta: In November, 1860, when it was probable that South Carolina might stand alone in secessionism, when it was known that Buchanan's Administration would not resort to coercion, and supposed that Lincoln's would not—in that month, and not later, the Alta published several editorial articles in favor of letting the seceders go in peace. The following from the leader of the 27th of that month is one of the most pointed passages of this kind:

If the Cotton States desire to secede, let them do so. Under our form of government the right of secession is sovereign and complete. It is nothing more than the right of the partner to retire from the firm when things are not going on to his satisfaction. Let them go, then, we say, in peace.

The New York Tribune, the San Francisco Times, and many other leading Republican journals, expressed similar ideas at that time, and even Lincoln appears to have had similar opinions as late as the time of his inauguration. The Alta did not endeavor to justify secession. It was no friend of slavery. It never worked for the chivalry. It did not advocate the cause of Breckinridge. During the Kansas struggle it was zealous in anti-Lecomptonism; during the campaign of '60 it was zealous for Douglas. On the morning after the news of Lincoln's election arrived, it declared its satisfaction with the result. It never hinted that the rights of the South were endangered by the victory of the Republican party. From the first it opposed the idea of a Pacific Republic, and after November, 1860, never said a word in favor of permitting secession. Whenever occasion presented, it was a warm Union paper. It heartily advocated the great Union demonstration in San Francisco on the 22d of May, 1861—a demonstration which had a vast influence in settling the loyalty of the State. During the State campaign of '61, it was the leading advocate of the election of Stanford, and it was the author of the "political panic" which gave 20,000 plurality to the Republicans. During all that summer, and the next winter and spring, the Alta and the Marysville Appeal worked hard to induce the Republicans to invite the Union Democrats to unite in a Union organization, and partly with their influence the union was effected in '62. Since that time, the Alta has always stood by the State party during campaigns. There is not a Southern man, a Copperhead, or a man who leans to Copperheadism, among either the editors or proprietors.

The leaders of the Bulletin in the latter part of 1860 and the beginning of '61 were written by Julian Bartlett, a Southern man, and some of his articles leaned a little too much to the South. He argued against coercion until May '61, and on the 25th April, '61, used the following language, quoting and evidently approving some unnamed authority:

In time of rebellion, insurrection, or invasion, the President of the United States has the power to call out the militia of such States as he may deem expedient, and keep them under arms six months; but the call must be made through the several Governors of States, who are to judge whether it is justified by the condition of affairs, and who may refuse to sanction it, if they think proper.

But Mr. Bartlett left the paper in May, '61, and died soon afterwards. During the last three years the editorial articles have been written by old Republicans. The paper has stood a firm friend and advocate of the Union party on every important question since the beginning of the war. There is not a Southern man, a Copperhead, or a man leaning towards Copperheadism, among the editors or proprietors.

We have thus given the records of the two leading journals of San Francisco, in regard to their loyalty. We have stated the full force of all that can truly be said against them; but we have gone further than their assailants, for we have told the whole truth, and stated the facts in their favor also. The charges against them are made, not for any love of truth or from any devotion to country, but because business competition and the opposition of clique have led to personal hatred, and that has been followed consecutively by malice, meanness, malignity, persistent falsehood and concealment of material truth.

Even if they had been Breckinridge organs in '60—even if they had been friends to slavery, even if they had urged secession and the formation of a Pacific Republic—still there is a limitation in politics. And if their consistency were a proper matter of unfavorable comment, that comment certainly should not come from Union men. Senator F. M. Smith was a Breckinridge man until late in 1861; but would it therefore be proper to deny his Unionism now? The same question might be asked in regard to S. W. Sanderson, elected by the Union party to the Supreme Bench, though he was a member of the Convention which nominated McConnell; and the same question might be asked with still more pertinence of Thompson Campbell, who was a Breckinridge elector in 1860, and who did not announce his change of politics until the summer of 1863. If we deny the limitation law we should turn out Butler, Dix, and a host of the best Union men in the country; if we recognize the limitation, the Alta and Bulletin are as much entitled to its benefit as any body in the wide world.

And, if there were any justice in the charge of disloyalty against the Alta and Bulletin, it would apply with equal force to the entire business community of the city. These journals are the representatives of San Francisco, the recipients of its patronage, the sharers of its prosperity, the organs of its dominant party, the standards of its public opinion, the voices of its unionism, and the leading laborers in laying the foundation of its loyalty. And it follows from all this as clearly as effect can follow cause, that any charge of secessionism against the Alta and Bulletin applies with equal force to people of San Francisco generally, and is an insult to their sense as well as to their patriotism. Certainly these journals are open to criticism on other points, but their loyalty is above suspicion.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE past week at the Academy of Music has been mainly devoted to comic opera. This is a pleasant change for most opera goers who have "supped full of horrors" in the poisoning, suicide and madness which constitute the denouement of four-fifths of the grand operas. The Doctor of Alcantara was given on Saturday evening to a good house. The music by Eichberg is light, but rippling and easy, and without being strongly marked, has some touches of Spanish quaintness to give it nationality. It was very well adapted to the story, which is exceedingly farcical and amusing. The acting of Miss Richings as "Inez" the soubrette heroine of the piece, was enough, independent of her lyric efforts, to stamp her as an artist. In the role of "Carlos," a kind of sentimental Spanish Dundreary, in love with Dr. Paracelsus' daughter, Mr. Hill was originally comical and clever, and repeatedly brought down the house. The music of his part was unimportant; he had little else to do but be funny, and the aching sides of his auditors was a proof of how well it was done. Mr. Hill made a decided hit in this character, and seemed to enjoy it. Perhaps, as there is a perilous edge to all highly-drawn sentiment, and the legitimate role of a tenor often borders on the limits of the burlesque, the audience were rather pleased to have an opportunity to laugh consistently and in perfect propriety at the hero of their old romances. Miss Kempton's voice did not strike us as favorably in this piece as in her previous role of "Pierotto," in Linda di Chamounix, although there was a manifest improvement in her acting. In fact, the uniform excellence of the playing in this piece was a matter of general comment. Mr. Seguin as the "Doctor," never before appeared to such advantage—the interest of the piece mainly resting on the joint efforts and excellent acting of himself and Miss Richings. Miss Julia Gould was very happy in her personation of the passée and conceited mother, and rendered her principal solo with good conception and spirit—qualities which have long made her a favorite with the public. Mr. Richings as "Señor Balthazar" (father of "Carlos") was clever and natural. Mr. Peakes, as "Don Pomposo," would have done better in his solos had his voice been more cultivated. The choruses were very well sung: one, that of the Night-Watch—in movement very suggestive of the well-known caravan march in The Desert—was very effectively rendered, as also was the finale. The lugubrious Good-Night quartette by the Doctor's household was very formal, Spanish and mirth-provoking. The costumes and properties were all in perfect keeping.

Adams' Postilion du Lonjumeau was performed for the first time in this city, on Monday evening. Although much of the music is familiar to the public, few are acquainted with the opera and its striking plot. The first act opens at Lonjumeau with the marraige of "Chapelau," (Mr. Hill,) a famous postilion, favorite tenor of the village choir, and provincial beau, with "Madelaine," mistress of the village inn, and niece of a remote but wealthy aunt, who is a coffee and sugar proprietress in the Isle of France. A pretty duet follows between the bride and groom, from which a quarrel springs up concerning the future aspects of their union as told them by two fortune-telling friends, whom they separately confess to have consulted, and who it appeared shadowed forth, like a prologue, what really occurs to them in the rest of the opera. Good humor, however, is soon restored, but the festivities following are interrupted by the inopportune arrival of the Chamberlain of the King and Director of his Majesty's Opera, who is travelling in search of a new tenor, to take the place of the regular artiste who has been taken ill. The Marquis's carriage breaks down at the village. By a regulation governing postilions in France, they are obliged to accompany any traveller who may demand their service at any moment, and there being no other postilion in the village, the Marquis calls on the newly-made bridegroom to go with him. Two circumstances tend to bring about the unfortunate denouement. The willingness of a jealous rival, the village blacksmith, (Seguin,) to repair the broken vehicle at once, and the effect of the Postilion's voice upon the Marquis, who having heard him sing at the festivities, discovers in the Postilion the tenor voice he is seeking, and resolves upon taking him back to Fontainebleau. The Marquis declares his purpose to the Postilion after the bride has retired, and paints a brilliant future for the ambitious bridegroom. Fired by personal vanity, and remembering the story of the fortune-teller, who promised him some such good fortune, the Postilion accepts, and deserts his wife for his new position the very night of their wedding. The blacksmith, who is in the secret, maliciously informs her of her husband's perfidy, and the act-drop falls on a sympathizing chorus, a fainting bride, and an exultant rival. Act second presupposes a lapse of ten years, in which the Postilion has become famous as a tenor of the Grand Opera and a Court favorite, under an assumed name. His old rival, the blacksmith, who has attached himself to his fortunes, now flourishes as baritone on the operatic boards of Fontainebleau. "Madelaine," in the interval, has gone over to her aunt at the Isle of France, who dying, leaves her niece her name and property. Under the title of "Madame de la Tour," she also turns up at Fontainebleau as a Court lady, beloved by the new tenor, (of whose personality as her faithless husband she is fully aware,) but whose gallantry she accepts, and whom she still loves. Vexed at his faithlessness, and yet experiencing a certain feminine pleasure in being the rival even of her former self, she resolves on a final test of his baseness, by putting the alternative of bigamy before him, and offers to accept him as her husband. To her horror he eagerly seizes the chance, and her marriage is set for the same day. The Marquis, however, overhears a conversation between her lover and his accomplice, the blacksmith, in which the crime of bigamy is proposed to be evaded by a mock-marriage—one of the opera chorus to personate the priest. This plot the Marquis discovers to Madelaine, who counterplots by cleverly substituting her own confessor in place of the chorus-singer, having first secured the assistance of the Marquis, by an ambiguous acceptance of his attentions. She forsakes him at the critical moment, however, and the ci-devant postilion and "Madelaine" are once more married. The Marquis, to revenge himself, gives information to the officers of justice of the supposed bigamist. An extremely affecting scene occurs, in which "Madame de la Tour," after the marriage, personates in the darkened salon alternately, the former and present bride, until gend'armes, lights and explanations arrive; and the curtain falls on forgiveness, repentance and promises of future amendment. Miss Richings' acting in this final scene was a histrionic triumph. The music of the opera was generally well sung—if we except the lack of strength in the tenor's voice, whose rendition of the postilion song would hardly have justified his engagement at the Grand Opera even at that remote period.

At Maguire's Opera House Bel Demonio, ruled until last Tuesday evening, when it was supplanted by Masks and Faces, a dramatization of Charles Reade's popular novel, Peg Woffington. The plot of the play will be remembered by all who have read the book. "Ernest Vane," a country gentleman, comes down to London and falls in love with the popular actress and beauty, "Peg Woffington," (Mrs. Perry.) He is a poet, and has a habit of blushing; the novelty pleases her, and she rather returns the passion and all that. Everything is going on swimmingly, and a nice little party is in progress at Vane's house, Mrs. Woffington and a number of her set being of course the guests, when "Mabel," Mr. Vane's wife suddenly drops in. Mrs. Woffington doesn't like the idea of having been deceived, and comes to the conclusion that even men who write poetry and blush are not to be relied on. Mrs. Vane (Lulu Sweet) isn't much better pleased when she comes to learn the true state of things, which she does through the officiousness of "Sir Charles Pomander," (Mr. Thorne,) who has designs upon the country beauty. In the meanwhile Triplet,) Mr. Wheatleigh,) a poor artist and author, has been brought into play. Mrs. Woffington has befriended him and his family, and his gratitude invests the actress with the beatific attributes of an angel. The grand point of the piece is made when Mrs. Woffington's friends come to the artist's room to see a picture he is painting of that lady, she having posted herself there previously and thrust her face through a hole which she cuts in the canvas. They criticize and find fault with the picture at their leisure, until Woffington suddenly confounds them by stepping from behind the canvas and showing them that it is her own face which they have been branding as a lamentably bad imitation of itself. The play goes on, and in the end Mabel gets back her husband, Triplet has a piece accepted by a manager, and everyone is happy except Wollington, who is left without a poet—a blushing one at that. Of course, much of the interest which pervades the novel is sacrificed in its dramatization, but it makes a very pretty and effective piece.

As "Triplet" Mr. Wheatleigh is excellent. We have seldom seen the best qualities of his acting displayed to better advantage. He never overdoes his part and he never suffers it to drop below the standard. From first to last his performance is a finished and even one; quiet and natural, correct in even the smallest details. Extravagance of praise is always to be avoided, but Mr. Wheatleigh in some of his characters is about as good an actor as we often see. And it is a sin and a shame that his houses are not better filled. It is useless to talk of the "hard times," because a calf with two heads or a hybrid without one at this very time would draw for three months and fill the house nightly to overflowing. For Mrs. Perry's "Peg Woffington," we can say a hearty word of praise, It can be said of this lady's acting, always, that she is natural, and happily free from that staginess and affectation which is the bane of the profession, the sad rock whereon so many otherwise excellent performers are wrecked and wretched. In soubrette parts, Mrs. Perry attracts attention by her vivacity, sprightliness and abounding good humor—adjuncts which she carries with her into the heavier business of the theatre. Her Peg Woffington was well dressed and well done, almost without exception. There was a broadness of burlesque in casting Barry for "Colley Cibber" that could only be equaled, not exceeded, by putting him in for a Hamlet or a Romeo. Cibber was a wit, and a beau, and a man about town—clever as wicked, and bright as a briar. As Sir Charles Pomander—of course the villain of the piece—Mr. Thorne was tolerable. One thing may be said of him: he generally dresses his parts well, and is never awkward. The main drawback to his success is the sepulchral tone in which he indulges, and his too rigid adherence to the traditions of the stage, instead of trusting to the dictates of nature. In Bel Demonio he was excellent. Of course, Lulu Sweet looked pretty as "Mabel;" for who has ever known her to look otherwise. She might borrow some hints, however, in regard to dress; and a little attention to the harmony of colors would add to the advantages with which nature has favored her. This afternoon and evening we are to have The Duke's Motto, as originally written, and played with such success abroad, Mr. Wheatleigh having bought the right to act it of John Brougham. We are somewhat anxious to see Mr. Wheatleigh's "Lagerdere," after the exaggerated burlesque which Mr. Allen gave of that character. The play should draw.

"Topsy Turvy," the entertaining feuilletoniste of the Sunday Mercury, is to have a benefit at the Metropolitan Theatre on Monday evening, and we do hope that for once that house will be filled. A comedy of her own writing, The Twin Roses, will be produced on the occasion, and an excellent entertainment is promised. Let the generous public go out for once and give a deserving woman and writer a benefit—just for once, to see how it would feel.

Lovers of art may see at Roman's a superb French edition of Don Quixote, illustrated by Gustave Doré—an artist whose name suggests an "apple of gold," if not "a picture of silver." Doré spent nearly two years in that part of Spain where the scenes of Don Quixote's adventures are laid by Cervantes, for the express purpose of being able faithfully to illustrate the book. He has succeeded to a charm. We have always had an admiration for Doré, viewing him as the Thackeray of the pencil; and now this admiration has deepened into affection. Such a Sancho, and such a Knight of the Rueful Countenance as he has given us! The work is magnificently printed, and bound in two quarto volumes; and its price places it within the means of all—only ninety dollars.

It must be very amusing to the personal friends of Gen. Grant, and to his companions of the mess, to read the stories which the newspapers are telling as indications of his character. To those who are privileged to know him as the genial, generous, candid friend, who, if he has secrets, hides them under the pleasant guise of entire freedom of conversation, it can but be surprising to hear that the Lieutenant-General clothes himself in mystery, and admits no partners of his thoughts. Yet it is undoubtedly true that Grant does seem a miracle of reticence to the inquisitive newsmongers and politicians—indeed we imagine most any gentleman would so seem to them.

Active preparations are being made for the opening of the Industrial Fair under the direction of the Mechanics' Institute, on the 30th of the present month. They are now raising the dome of the Fair building in Union Square. Appearances indicate that in this Fair we will have one of the best exhibitions ever known on the coast.

The advertisement of John Carrington will be found among our advertising columns. Mr. Carrington is so well known in the city where his business is located, that it is but faint praise to say that he is clever in his vocation—that of general agent for everybody and everything. He advertises to fill all orders from abroad or at home for anything from a tooth-brush to a steam engine. There is nothing too old or too new, too scarce or too difficult, for him to obtain. In saying that he can fill an order for anything, and deliver it in any part of the world, we only say what many of our citizens who have tried him are willing to swear to. The only thing that he has notably failed to furnish is a shower, which an eminent agriculturist of this coast ordered some time since. Mr. Carrington is also publisher of the Commissionaire a clever little paper, from which we take the prospectus of the "Hardshell and Hydraulic Clam Mining Company," which will be found in another column.

OF ARMY AND NAVY INTEREST.

A Once Californian in Command at West Point.—Brig.-Gen. Z. B. Tower, U. S. Volunteers, and Major of Engineers, has been ordered to relieve Col. A. H. Bowman, U. S. Corps of Engineers, as Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point. Gen. Tower, the newly-appointed Superintendent, is an officer of long and distinguished service in the Engineer corps. All who know him will readily recognize his eminent fitness for the responsible position to which he has been assigned. He was graduated at the Academy in 1841, leading his class. in which were such men as Horatio G. Wright, who stood next to him, Nathaniel Lyon, who was killed in the early days of the war. Samuel Jones, the rebel general, how lamented John F. Reynolds, Don Carlos Buell, William T. H. Brooks, I. B. Richardson, Richard B. Garnett, and other well known officers of the Union and rebel armies. Soon after his graduation he served as an acting and afterwards as a full Assistant Professor of Engineering in the Academy (1842-3,) with whose traditions and system of instruction he is thoroughly familiar. During the Mexican War, he distinguished himself in the battle of Cerro Gordo, Contreras, and Cherubusco, and at Chapultepec he was wounded, and won a brevet rank as Major of Engineers for gallant and meritorious services. In 1850 he, with Gen. (then Maj.) Barnard was engaged in the work of constructing the fortifications of San Francisco; and when Maj. Barnard was ordered to West Point in 1855, as Superintendent of the Military Academy, Maj. Tower remained in California and took charge of engineering operations. He came East at the outbreak of the rebellion, and in November, 1861, was made Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and at the same time brevet Lieutenant-Colonel in his corps. During the present war he has added to his previous reputation, while to his Chapultepec wound he adds a wound received in the second Bull Run battle. Col. Bowman retires from the Academy after having held the position of Superintendent for a little more than three years. It will be remembered that in January, 1841, Maj. Delafield, who had twice held the command at West Point was relieved by Captain and Brevet-Major P. G. T. Beauregard, who, five days afterwards, was ordered to transfer the command back to Maj. Delafield, who on the first of March of the same year was in turn succeeded by Maj. Bowman. Gen. Tower will be the fifteenth Superintendent of the Academy, and will enter upon his labors under the happiest auspices. He will find the institution in a condition of great prosperity, more than ever before honored among the people, and the pride of the army.—Army and Navy Journal.

Samuel S. Smoot, a contractor for supplies for the army, having failed to comply with articles of agreement entered with Capt. James A. Elkin, Chief Quartermaster, Cavalry Bureau, has been tried by a court-martial held in Washington, upon the charge of "wilful neglect of duty, in violation of the act of Congress, approved July 17, 1862." The court have found the accused guilty; he has been directed to pay to the United States a fine of $10,000, and be confined at Fort Delaware until such fine is paid, provided such imprisonment shall not exceed three years.

Lieut. Perry, of the 1st regular Cavalry, who is now on duty at Camp Stoneman, was fired at five times by a private of the 18th Pennsylvania cavalry, who was intoxicated and on provost duty at the time. He served for some time in the rebel army, but becoming incensed against his captain, shot him and deserted, after which he enlisted in our army. He is now in confinement.

Brig.-Gen. Birge has been relieved from the command of the Baton Rouge military district, Department of the Gulf, and is succeeded by Brig.-Gen. Benton, of the Thirteenth army corps. Gen. Fitz Henry Warren has succeeded Gen. Benton in the same command. Gen. Birge resumes command in the Nineteenth corps, and Gen. Benton will take command of the Thirteenth corps at Carrolton.

Brig.-Gen. Kilpatrick has lately received the degree of A. M. from Rutgers College, at Brunswick, N. J. Gen. Kilpatrick was present during the commencement exercises, and his appearance so excited the venerable trustees of the institution that they voted him the degree, and the President conferred it upon him on the spot.

James M. Hobby is the name of the engineer of the United States steamer Sassacus. This officer stuck to his post amid the most trying circumstances. Even after he had been severely scalded by steam escaping from a shot-hole in the boiler, he stood by and worked the ship out of the reach of the enemy.

By a circular to Navy Paymasters, the Secretary has ordered that in all cases, officers attached to a squadron by order of a Department, are entitled to sea pay while on duty under such order, though the commander of the squadron may occasionally employ them on shore duty or assign to duty on board store or receiving ships, or in hospitals.

From the 9th May, 1864, to June 10th, the Medical Department sent to Belle Plain, Fredericksburg, Port Royal and White House, surgeons, (volunteer, contract and regimental,) nurses, medical students and attendants, to the number of one thousand.

Brig.-Gen. Wm. Birney, ordered to the command of the District of Florida, Department of the South, has proceeded to Jacksonville. Brig.-Gen. Gordon, relieved by Gen. Birney, was ordered to report at Washington.

The President has accepted the resignations of the following officers of Gen. Fremont's staff: Col. Anselme Albert, Col. John T. Fiala, Col. Charles Zagonyi, Lieut.-Col. John G. Pilsen, Maj. Leonidas Haskell.

A board of officers, has been organized, to assemble in Washington on the 15th inst., to examine into and report upon Professor E. N. Horsford's memorial on the army rations.

The report that the Veteran Reserve corps is to be reorganized is incorrect. No changes of its present organization are contemplated.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

I hate hypocrisy! It obscures from view the measure of truth we really possess. Men put forth profession instead of belief till they do not themselves distinguish between the two. They shuffle and confuse their own best faiths amongst articles of creed to which they give a mere verbal assent. Many a man who is thought by others to be a greater believer than he really is, thinks himself a greater disbeliever than he really is. He almost loses sight of some of the highest truths of his reason, because he has habitually mixed them up with detested or suspected superstrictions. Besides, it is by open and candid speech, man to man, that each one of us comes fully to understand what he does believe in. Shut up my mouth and you will soon shut up my thought too. If I must practice a dishonest speech, I lose the habit of thinking honestly.—Thorndale, 289.

In all ages and nations, in all periods of life—even in childhood—the idea of right and wrong is manifested, and the great elements of moral being may be shown to exist, however perverted or imperfectly developed. Those who regard morality as something acquired and invented, would perhaps also say that man first learned to breathe from his mother; that the tears of the eye, the sighs of the heart, are inventions of the actor upon the theatre of the earth, in order to deceive the spectator and win his favor. They would perchance also regard the mother's joy in her smiling suckling, and her tears over the fresh hillock, which contains the fallen blossom of her happiness, as an acquired manner. Against these skeptical slaves of tradition and utility, the teachers of philosophy now come forth, and maintain that eternal laws of justice and virtue lie in human nature, which need only to be attentively observed and reduced to their ultimate foundation in order to produce a moral system complete, and in itself necessary.—De Wette. Ethics.

If the divine favor be inseparably connected with the belief of certain speculative opinions, and not with the practice of certain moral and religious duties, it is doubtless a proof of the highest regard for the true interests of our fellow-creatures to take every possible method of diffusing the knowledge and belief of those tenets, and by deterring by wholesome severities any attempts to innovate upon that system, an entire and implicit acquiescence in which is pronounced by infallible authority to be the sole means of attaining to happiness in a future state. All virtue is founded on the basis of utility. If, then, the torture, or even the destruction of the body be necessary to the salvation of the soul, this discipline, though sharp and rigorous, is just and laudable; and the rack, the stake and the wheel are all converted into the benign instruments of christian compassion.—Belsham.

There can be no doubt that the present tendency of scientific investigation, is to show a much more intimate relation than has been commonly supposed to exist between the vital and physical agencies; and to prove that whilst the former are of a nature altogether peculiar, they are yet dependent on conditions supplied by the latter. And the more closely these phenomena are investigated, the more intimate and uniform does that dependence appear; so that we seem to have the general conclusion almost forced upon us, that the vital forces of different kinds have the same relation to the several physical forces of the inorganic world that they have to each other.—Dr. Carpenter on the Mental Relations of Vital and Physical Force.

Germany is the most fruitful soil of Pantheism, which is the religion of our greatest thinkers, our best artists; and Deism, as I shall hereafter relate, is there long since overthrown in theory. People do not say it, but every body knows it. Pantheism is the open secret of Germany. Indeed, we have outgrown Deism. We are free, and want no thundering tyrant. We have attained our majority and want no paternal care. We are not the machines of a great mechanic. Deism is a religion for slaves, for children, for Genevese, for watchmakers. Pantheism is the secret religion of Germany.—Heine (while Pantheist).—German Philosophy.

Indeed, neither a vision, nor a seraphic excitement, nor a voice from heaven, nor any wonderful dreams, or other miraculous influence, led me to the road of salvation; and I owe my enlightenment entirely and simply to the reading of one book—a book? Yes, and it is an old and plain book, modest as nature and as true; a book which has an every-day and unpretending look, like the sun which warms us; like the bread which nourishes us; a book which looks upon us as friendly, as kindly, as an old grandmother, who reads daily in the book, with the dear trembling lips, and with spectacles on nose; and this book is called in brief the book—the Bible. It is properly called the Holy Scripture. He who has lost his God can find them again in this Book; and he who has never known Him, will be refreshed here by the breath of the Divine Word.—Heinrich Heine (after becoming Christian).—Ger. Phil. Int.

A rapid and succinct view of human affairs and events, as far back as the dimmest light of history extends, shows that the diversified aspects of civilization have been successively elaborated through different people and at different eras. It demonstrates that the civilizing impulses have been inherent, inborn in man, of almost all historical races and nations, and in various regions and climates.—Gurowski—America and Europe—Preface.

The history of philosophy presents the spectacle of thousands of intellects—some the greatest that have made our race illustrious—steadily concentrated on problems believed to be of vital importance, yet producing no other result than a conviction of the extreme facility of error, and the remoteness of any probability that truth can be reached.—G. H. Lewis' History of Philosophy—Introduction.

THE NOTTING HILL MYSTERY.

SECTION III.

1. Extracts from Mrs. Anderton's Journal.

AUGUST 13, 1854.—Here we are, then, finally established at Notting Hill. Jane laughs at us for coming to town just as every one else is leaving it; but in my eyes, and I am sure in dear William's too, that is the pleasantest time for us. Poor Willie, he grows more and more sensitive to blame from any one, and has been sadly worried by this discussion about our Dresden trip. The new professor to-morrow. I wonder what he will be like.

Aug. 14.—And so that is the new professor! I do not think I was ever so astonished in my life. That little stout squab man, the most powerful mesmerist in Europe! And yet he certainly is powerful, for he had scarcely made a pass over me before I felt a glow through my whole frame. There is something about him, too, when one comes to look at him more closely, which puzzles me very much. He certainly is not the commonplace man he appears, though it would be difficult just now to say what makes me so sure of it.

Aug. 25.—Quite satisfied now. How could I have ever thought the Baron commonplace! And yet, at first sight, his appearance is certainly against him. He is not a man with whom I should like to quarrel. I don't think he would have much compunction in killing any one who offended him, or who stood in his way. How quietly he talks of those horrid experiments in the medical schools, and the tortures they inflict on the poor hospital patients. Willie says it is all nonsense, and says all doctors talk so; but I can't help feeling that there is something different about him. And yet he is certainly doing me good.

Sept. 1.—Better and better, and yet I cannot conquer the strange feeling which is growing upon me about the Baron. He is certainly an extraordinary man. What a grasp he takes of anything on which he rests his hand even for a moment; and how perfectly he seems to disregard anything that stands in his way. This morning I was at the window when he came, and I was quite frightened when I saw him, as I thought, so nearly run over. But I might have spared my anxiety, for my gentleman just walked quietly on, while the poor horse started almost across the road. Had it caught sight of those wonderful green eyes of his, that it seemed so frightened? What eyes they are! You can hardly ever see them; but when you do!—And yet the man is certainly doing me good.

Sept. 11.—So it is settled that the Baron is not to mesmerise me himself any more. Am I sorry or glad? At all events, I hope they will not now worry poor William. . . .

Sept. 13.—First day of Mademoiselle Rosalie. Seems a nice person enough; but it feels very odd to lie there on the sofa while some one else is being mesmerised for one.

Sept. 15.—This new plan is beginning to answer. I think I feel the mesmerism even more than when I was mesmerised myself, and this way one gets all the pleasures and none of the disagreeables. It is so delicious. Looked back to-day at my Malvern journals. So odd to see how I disliked the idea at first, and now I could hardly live without it.

Sept. 29.—I think we shall soon be able to do without the Baron altogether. I am sure Rosalie and I could manage very well by ourselves. What a wonderful thing this mesmerism is! To think that the mere touch of another person's hand should soothe away pain, and fill one with health and strength. Really, if I had not always kept a journal, I should feel bound to keep one now, as a record of the wonderful effects of this extraordinary cure. Got up this morning with a nasty headache. No appetite for breakfast. Eyes heavy, and pulse low. Poor William in terrible tribulation, when lo! in comes little Mademoiselle Rosalie and the Baron. The gentleman makes a pass or two—the lady pops her little, dry, monkey-looking paw upon my forehead, and, presto! the headache has vanished, and I'm calling for chocolate and toast!

Sept. 30.—A blank day. Headache again this morning, and looking out anxiously for my little brown "good angel," when in comes the Baron, with the news that she cannot come. Up all night with a dying lady, and so fagged this morning that he is afraid she would do me more harm than good. I am sure she cannot feel more fagged than I do, poor girl. But, after all, in spite of the delight of doing so much good, what a life it must be!

Oct. 1.—Rosalie here again. Headache vanished. Everything bright as the October sun outside. I am getting quite fond of that girl. How I wish she could speak something besides German. . . .

Oct. 4.—It is quite extraordinary what a hold that poor girl, Rosalie, is taking upon me. I am even beginning to dream of her at night. . . .

Oct. 6.—Headache again this morning, and a message that Rosalie cannot come. How provoking that it is on the same day. . . .

Oct. 12.—I think I shall really soon begin to know when poor Rosalie has been over-worked. Headache again to-day, and I had a presentiment that she would not be able to come. . . .

Oct. 20.*—So now the Baron is going to leave us. Well, I am indeed thankful that he can now so well be spared. Jane Morgan here to-day, and of course laughing at the idea of mesmerism doing any good. She could not deny, though, how wonderfully better I am, and indeed, but for those tiresome headaches, which always seem to come just when poor Rosalie is too tired to take them away, I am really quite well and strong.

Oct. 31.—Something evidently wrong between poor Rosalie and the Baron. She has evidently been crying, and I suppose it must be from sympathy, but I feel exactly as if I had been crying too. Very little satisfaction from the mesmerism to-day. It seems rather as if it had given me some of poor Rosalie's depression. How I wish she could speak English, or that I could speak German, and then I would find out what is the matter. Perhaps she is to lose her work when the Baron goes. Mem.: To ask him to-morrow.

Nov. 1.—No. He says he shall certainly take her with him to Germany, and "he hopes that may have a beneficial effect." What can he mean? He says she is quite well, but throws out mysterious insinuations as to something being wrong with her. How I do wish I could speak German.

Nov. 3.—Still that uncomfortableness between the Baron and Rosalie. I am sure there is something wrong, and that she wants to speak to me about it, but is afraid of him. It certainly is strange that he should never leave us alone. Mem.: To ask William to get him out of the way for a little while to-morrow, though what good that will be when she and I cannot understand each other, I hardly know after all. . . .

Nov. 4.—What a day this has been! I feel quite tired out with the excitement, and yet I cannot make up my mind to go to bed until I have written it all down. In the first place, this is to be my last visit from Rosalie, at all events till they come back from the continent. I cannot help perceiving that William is not altogether sorry that she is going. Dear fellow! I do really believe that he is more than half jealous of the extraordinary feeling for her. And certainly it is extraordinary that a woman quite in another class of life, of whom one knows nothing, should have taken such a hold upon me. I suppose it must be the mesmerism, which certainly is a very mysterious thing. If it is so, it is at all events very fortunate it did not take that turn with the Baron himself. Ugh! I can really begin to understand now all the objections I thought so foolish and so tiresome three or four months ago, before Rosalie first came. And yet, after all, I don't think—in spite of mesmerism or anything else—one need ever have been afraid of liking the Baron too much. I could quite understand being afraid of him. Rosalie evidently is, and to own the truth so am I a little, or I should not have been beaten in that way to-day. To-day was my last séance with Rosalie, and I had made up my mind to get the Baron out of the way, and try and get something out of Rosalie. They came at 2 o'clock as usual, and as I thought I would not lose a chance, I got dear William to lie in wait in his study, and call to the Baron as he passed, in hopes that Rosalie would come up alone. That was no use, however for the Baron kept his stout little self perseveringly between her and the staircase, and when I went—thinking to be very clever—to the top of the staircase and called to her to come up, it only gave him an excuse for breaking away from poor William altogether, and coming straight up to me before her. I was so provoked, I could hardly be civil. Well, of course the Baron was in a great hurry, and we went to work at once with the mesmerising. When that was done, we both tried to keep them talking, and I made signs to William to get the Baron out of the way. I was really begining to get quite anxious about it, and kept on repeating to myself the two German words I had learned on purpose from Jane Morgan this morning. It was of no use, however, and I began to grow quite nervous; and I am quite sure Rosalie saw what I was wauting, for she seemed to get fidgety too, and then that made me more nervous still. At last the Baron declared he must go, and they both got up to leave. William would have given it up, but he says I looked so imploringly at him he could not resist, so I make one more effort by asking the Baron to come into his study for a short private consultation. This he refused, saying he had not time but could say anything needful where we were. Then William told me to take Rosalie into the next room, but the Baron would not have that either, though he laughed when he said he could not trust to a lady's punctuality in this case, but if I would leave Rosalie she would not understand anything that was said. Of course this would not do, and at last William with more presence of mind and determination than I should have thought him capable of, took him by the buttonhole and fairly drew him away into the further window, where he began whispering eagerly to him to draw off his attention. I suppose it was the consciousness of a sort of stratagem, but my heart beat quite fast as I brought out my two words, "Gibst' was?" and I could see that hers was so too. She seemed surprised at my speaking to her in German, and certainly I was no less so to hear her answer in English, with a slight accent certainly, but still in quite plain English, "Don't seem to listen. I am . . ." and then she stopped suddenly and turned quite pale, and I could feel all my own blood rush back to my heart with such a throb! I looked up, and there were the Baron's eyes fixed upon us. Poor Rosalie seemed quite frightened, and I declare I felt so too. At all events, we neither of us ventured on another word, and the next minute the Baron succeeded in fairly shaking off poor William and taking his leave. So there is an end of my little romance about Rosalie. I am sure there was something in it. Why, if she had nothing particular to say, should she have taken the trouble of learning that little bit of English? and why—but I must not sit here all night speculating about this, which after all is, I daresay, nothing at all. It is positively just 12 o'clock.

Nov. 6.—How strange! There is certainly some mystery about Rosalie and the Baron. I am quite certain I saw them in a cab together this morning, and yet they were to cross on Saturday night and be in Paris yesterday. I wonder whether they were late after all, and yet an hour and a half is surely time enough to London Bridge, and if he had missed the train I should think he would have come to us yesterday At all events he might have gone early this morning. It is very odd. . . .

Nov. 7.—I wonder whether any one ever had such a husband as I have got. Yesterday he must needs worry himself with the idea that I am fretting about the loss of my mesmerism—as if I could possibly think a moment about the loss of anything when I had got him with me. So nothing would satisfy him but that we must go to the Haymarket to see Paul Pry and the Spanish Dancers. I have not laughed so much for many a long day. I don't like all that violent dancing, so we came away directly after the absurd little farce—How to Pay the Rent. How we did laugh at it to be sure, and the absurdities of that little monkey, Clark. Wright, too, in Paul Pry, is quite inimitable. Dear William, how good it was of him! . . .

Dec. 5.—Just going to the theatre again when news came of Poor Harry Morton's illness. My own dear William, how good he is to every one. And so prompt, too. Touch his heart or his honor, and the Duke himself could not be more quick and decided. The news only came as we were dressing, and to-morrow we are off to Naples to meet poor Mr. Morton, and nurse him.

Dec. 6.—There is no one like Willie. After all the scramble we have had to get ready, he would not take me across when it was so rough. So we have taken two dear little rooms, from day to day, because Willie cannot bear the publicity of an hotel, and I am sure I hate it too, and we are to wait till it is fine enough to cross.

Dec. 9.—Still here; but the wind has gone down almost suddenly within the last three hours, and to-morrow morning I hope we really shall cross. Dear William getting quite worried; I persuaded him to take me to a lecture that was going on, and while we were there the wind went down, and we have been packing up ever since. Twelve o'clock! and William calling to me. I must just put down about Mr. . . . Good Heaven! What is the matter? I feel so ill—quite—

2. Statement of Dr. Watson.

My name is James Watson, and I am a physician of about thirty years' standing. In 1854, I was practicing at Dover. On the night of the 9th of December in that year, I was sent for hurriedly to see a lady of the name of Anderton, who had been taken suddenly ill immediately after her return from a lecture at the Town-hall, which she had attended with her husband. The message was brought by the servant from the lodgings where they were living. On our way to the house she told me that "the lady was dying, and the poor gentleman quite distracted." On arriving at the house I found Mr. Anderton supporting his wife in his arms. He seemed greatly agitated, and cried, "For God's sake be quick—I think she has got the cholera!" Mrs. Anderton was on the couch in her dressing-room, partially undressed, but with two or three blankets thrown over her, as she seemed shivering with the cold. There was a good fire in the room, but notwithstanding this and the blankets, her hands and feet were both quite chilly.* I asked Mr. Anderton why she had not been got to bed, to which he replied that she had been vomiting, until within a very few moments, so violently that they had been unable to move her. Almost immediately on my arrival the vomiting recommenced, though there appeared to be now hardly anything left in the stomach to come away. The retching continued with unabating violence for more than an hour after the stomach had been evidently completely emptied, and was accompanied with great purging and severe cramps both in the stomach and the extremities. I at once sent to my house for a portable bath I happened to have hired for my own wife's use, and on its arrival placed Mrs. Anderton in it at a temperature of 98 deg., having previously added three-quarters of a pound of mustard. While waiting for the bath, I administered thirty drops of laudanum in a wine-glassful of hot brandy and water, but without in any degree checking the purging, which continued almost incessantly, and was of a most watery character. It was accompanied also by violent pains and great swelling of the epigastrium. A fresh dose of opium was equally unsuccessful, nor was any amelioration of symptoms produced by the exhibition of prussic acid and creosote. On removing the patient from the warm bath, I had her carefully placed in bed, shortly after which she began to perspire profusely, but without any relief to the other symptoms. . . . I now began to fear that some deleterious substance had been unconsciously swallowed, the more especially as the patient had, up to the very moment of her seizure, been in unusually good health. I therefore made careful examinations with the view to detecting the presence of arsenic; and instituted, by the aid of Mr. Anderton, the strictest inquiries as to whether there was in the house any preparation containing this or any other irritant poison. Nothing of the kind could, however, be found, nor were such tests, as I was at the time in a position to apply, able to detect anything of the kind to which my suspicions were directed. Deliberate poisoning proved, moreover, on consideration, entirely out of the question, as there could be no doubt of Mr. Anderton's devoted attachment to his wife, and the people of the house were entire strangers to her. Moreover, the length of time since any food had been taken was almost conclusive against such a supposition. Mrs. Anderton, I was informed, had dined at 6 o'clock, and between that hour and midnight, when the attack came on, had eaten nothing but a biscuit and part of a glass of sherry-and-water the remainder of which was in the glass upon the dressing-room table when I arrived. Since then I have removed portions of all the matters tested, as well as the remaining wine and water, and have had them thoroughly examined by a scientific chemist, but equally without result. I am compelled, therefore, to believe that the symptoms arose from some natural though undiscovered cause. Possibly from a sudden chill in coming from the heated rooms into the night air, though this seems hardly compatible with the fact that she never complained of cold during the long drive home, and that she was seated comfortably in her dressing-room, making her customary entries in her journal, when the attack came on. Another very suspicious circumstance was that, afterwards mentioned by her, of a strong metallic taste in her mouth, a symptom sometimes occasioned, and in conjunction likewise with the others noticed in her case, by the exhibition of excessive doses of antimony in the form of emetic tartar. This medicine, however, had never been prescribed for her, nor was there any possibility of her ever having had access to any in mistake. At Mr. Anderton's request, however, I exhibited the remedies used in such a case, as port wine, infusion of oak bark, etc., but with as little effect as the other medicines. Indeed, the remedies of whatever kind were precluded from exercising their full action by the extreme irritability of the stomach, by which they were ejected almost as soon as swallowed. This being the case, I abandoned any further attempt at the exhibition of the heavy doses I had hitherto employed, or indeed of drugs of any kind, and confined myself, until the irritation of the epigastrium should have been in some measure allayed, to a treatment I have occasionally found successful in somewhat similar cases—the administration, that is to say, of simple soda-water in repeated doses of a tea-spoonful at a time. I have often found this to remain with good effect upon the stomach when everything else was at once rejected, nor was I disappointed in the present case. About an hour after commencing this treatment, the first violence of the symptoms began to subside, and by the next afternoon the case had resolved itself into an ordinary one of severe gastroenteritis, which I then proceeded to treat in the regular manner. After quite as short a period as I could possibly have expected, this also was subdued, leaving the patient, however, in a state of great prostration, and subject to night perspirations of a most lowering character. I now began to throw in tonics, and to resort, though very cautiously, to more invigorating diet. Under this treatment she continued steadily to improve, through

* This portion of Dr. Watson's statement, relating entirely to the symptoms of Mrs. Anderton's case, though some details are excluded, necessarily contains much that must be interesting only to the medical profession and disagreeable to the general reader. The following paragraph may therefore be passed over, merely noting that the symptoms were such as would be compatible with antimonial poisoning the perspirations still continued, and her constitution cannot be said to have at all recovered the severe shock it had sustained by the month of April, 1855, when they left Dover, by my recommendation, for change of air. Since that time I have not seen her. I am quite unable to account for the seizure from any cause but that of a chill; an hypothesis which, I must admit, rests its authority almost solely on the fact that no other can be found.

3. Extracts from Mrs. Anderton's Journal—Continued.

Jan. 20, 1855.—At last I get back once more to my old brown friend.* Dear old thing, how pleasant its old face seems! Very little to-day, though; only a word or two, just to say it is done. Oh, how it tries one!

Jan. 25.—My own dear husband's birthday; and, thank Heaven! I am once more able to sit with him. Oh! how kind he has been through all these weary weeks, when I have been so fretful and impatient. Why should suffering make one cross? God knows, I have suffered. I never thought to live through that terrible night. It makes me shudder to think of it. And then, that horrid, deathlike, leaden taste—that was worst of all. Well, thank God! I am better now, but so weak. I am quite tired with writing even these few lines. . . .

Feb. 12.—How weak I still am! Walked out to-day with dear William for the first time upon the pier, but had scarcely got to the end of it, when I felt so tired I was obliged to sit down while poor William went to fetch a chair to fetch me home.

Feb. 13.—I have been quite startled to-day. I was talking to Dr. Watson about my being so tired yesterday, and about how very weak I still was, and how ill I had been—and at last he let slip that, at the time, he thought I had been poisoned. It gave me quite a turn, and then he tried to make us talk of something else, but I could not get it out of my head, and kept coming back and back to it, and woudering who could have had any possible interest in poisoning poor me. And so we went on talking; and, at last, Dr. Watson said something which let out that at first he had suspected—William! my own William! my precious, precious husband! Oh! I thought I should have choked on the spot. I don't know what I said, but I do know I could not have said too much, and poor William tried to laugh it off, and said: "Who else would have gained anything by it? Would he not have had that miserable £25,000? and besides him there was no one but the Charities in India, and they could not have done it, because they would not exist till they were gone;" but I could see how he winced at the idea, and I felt as though my blood were really boiling in my veins. And then that man—oh! how thankful I shall be when we can get away from him—tried to persuade me that he had not really thought it. I should think not, indeed! and that he soon saw it was impossible, and all that; and at last, I fairly burst out crying with passion, and ran out of the room. And—and—I could cry now to think of my poor dear Willie being—and I shall, too, if I go on thinking about it any longer, so I will write no more to-night.

Feb. 15.—No journal yesterday, I really could not trust myself to write. And poor Willie, though he tried to laugh at it, I could see how bitterly he felt the imputation. Good Heaven! think if that wretched man had really charged him with it. It would have killed him. I know it would, and he would rather have died a thousand times. Well, I must not think of it any more. Only once more, thank Heaven! we shall soon be going away.

April 7.—Back once more at home, thank Heaven! But how slow, how very slow this convalescence, as they call it, is. Oh! shall I ever be well again, as I was last year before that horrid day at Dover!

May 3.—So we are to leave England for a time, and try the German baths. I am almost thankful for it. I have grown very fond, too, of this dear little luxurious house, though I could hardly say why. It is like my wonderful fancy for Rosalie. Ah, poor Rosalie! I wonder where she is now, and when they will return. I cannot help thinking she might do me some good. But, as I was saying: fond as I am of this dear little house, I shall be really glad to leave it for a time, and see what change of air will do for me. If I could only get rid of those terrible night perspirations. It is they that pull me down so, and make me so weak and miserable. Oh! what would I not give to be well once more, if it were only to get rid of the memory of that time.

July 7.—Safe at Baden Baden; and too early as yet for the majority of the English pleasure-seekers. What a delicious place this is! I declare I quite feel myself better already. . . .

Sept. 11.—Really almost well again. Quite a comfortable talk to-day with dear Willie about that foolish Dr. Watson; the first time the subject has been mentioned between us, since that day when I got into such a passion about it. Poor man, he was hardly worth going into a rage about. We heard to-day of his having made some terrible blunder in the new place he has gone to, and lost all his practice by killing some poor old woman through it. It was this made us talk of his poisoning notion, and oh! how glad I was to see that dear Willie had quite got over his nervousness about it. We had quite a long talk; and, at last, he promised me faithfully never to say a word more about it to any one.

Oct. 10.—Home again at last, and in our own dear little house. And really I feel once more as well and strong as this time last year. Dear William, too, how happy he is; the shadow seems to have passed away. God grant it may not return.

Oct. 30.—An eventful day. All the morning at the Crystal Palace, and just as we returned who should walk in but the Baron R.! It was just a year since he left us, but he had not altered in the very least. I do not think that short, square figure, with the impenetrable rosy face, and the large white hands, and those wonderful great green eyes that you can so rarely catch, and when you had caught, so invariably wish you had let alone, can ever change. I am afraid I was not very cordial to him. I ought to be, for he has done great things for me; and yet somehow when I saw him, I felt quite a cold shudder run all through me. Dear William saw it, and asked if I was ill, and when I laughed and said, "No, it was only some one walking over my grave," I could not help fancying that for a moment the Baron's lips seemed to turn quite white, and I just caught one glance from those awful eyes that seemed as if it would read me through and through. And yet after all it may have been only fancy, for the next moment he was talking in his rich, quiet voice as though nothing could ever disturb him. So Rosalie is gone. That is clear at all events, though what has exactly become of her I cannot quite so well understand. From all I can make out, she seems, poor girl, to have married very foolishly, and it was that that was the matter between them when they went away last year. The Baron seemed indeed to hint at something even worse, but he would not speak out plainly, and I would defy any one to make that man say one word more than he may choose. Poor Rosalie, I hope she has not come to any harm.

Nov. 1.—Another visit from the Baron, to say good-bye before his return to—his wife! How strange that we should never have heard of her before, and even now I cannot make out whether he has married since he left us or whether he was always so. Certainly that man is a mystery, and just now it pleases him to talk especially in enigmas. He does not seem disposed, however, to put up with vague information on our part. I thought he never would have done questioning poor William and me about my illness, and at last he drew it out of me—not out of William, dear fellow—what that foolish Dr. Watson had said. After all I am not sorry I told him, for it was quite a relief to hear him speak so strongly of the absurdity of such an idea, and I am sure it was a comfort to poor William. He (the Baron) spoke very strongly too about the danger of setting such ideas about, and particularly cautioned dear Willie not to mention it to any one. I knew he would not have done so any way, but this will make him more comfortable.

April 3.—Such a delightful day and so tired. I never saw Richmond look so lovely, and how dear Willie and I did enjoy ourselves in that lovely park. But oh! I am so sleepy. Not a word more.

April 5.—Another lovely day—strolling about Lord Holland's Park all the morning, and this evening some music in our own dear little drawing-room. How happy—how very happy—good Heaven, what is this? That old horrible leaden taste; and, oh, so deadly sick. . . .

April 6.—Thank Heaven, the attack seems to have passed away. Oh, how it frightened me. Thank Heaven, too, I was able to keep the worst from dear Wiiliam, and he did not know how like it was to that other dreadful time.

April 20.—Again that horrible sickness, and worse—oh, far worse—still, that awful deadly leaden taste. Worse this time. In bed all day yesterday. Poor Willie terribly anxious. Pray Heaven it may not come again.

May 6.—Another attack. God help me! if this should go on, I do not know what will become of me. Already I am beginning to feel weaker and weaker. Poor Willie! these last three days have been terrible ones for him. However, the doctor says it will all pass off. Pray Heaven it may!

May 25.—More sickness, more derangement, more of that horrible leaden taste. The doctor himself is beginning to look uncomfortable, and I can see that poor Willie's mind is reverting to that terrible suggestion a year ago. Thank Heaven, I have as yet managed to conceal from him and from Dr. Dodsworth that horrid deadly taste which made such an impression on Dr. Watson. Oh, when will this end!

June 10.—A horrible suspicion is taking possession of me. What can this mean? I look back through my journal, and it is every fortnight that this fearful attack returns. The 5th and 18th of April—3d and 21st of May—and now again the 7th of this month. And that terrible leaden taste which is now almost constantly in my mouth; and with every attack my strength failing—failing—oh God, what can it be?

June 26.—Another fortnight, another attack. There must be foul play somewhere. And yet who could—who would do such a thing? Thank Heaven, I have still concealed from my poor William that worst symptom of all, the horrible leaden taste which is now never out of my mouth. My precious Willie, how kind, how good he is to me. . . .

July 12.—I cannot hold out much longer now. Each time the attack returns I lose something of the little, the very little strength that is left. God help me, I feel now that I must go. . . . . The Baron came to-day, and for a moment my poor boy's face lighted up with hope again. They had a long discussion before the doctor would consent to consult with him, but after that, they seemed to change the medicines. But something must have gone wrong, for I have never seen Dr. Dodsworth look so grave.

Aug. 1.—I think the end is drawing very near now. This last attack has weakened me more than ever, and I write this in my bed. I shall never rise from it again. My poor, poor Willie. . . . Three days I have been in bed now, but I have taken nothing from any hand but his.

Aug. 17.—This is, I think, almost the last entry I shall make. Another fortnight and I shall be too weak to hold the pen—if, indeed, I am still here.

Sept. 5.—Another attack. Strange how this weary body wears up against all this pain. Would that it were over; and yet my poor, poor boy . . . He, too, is almost worn out; night and day he never leaves me. . . . I take the things from his hand, but I cannot taste them now—nothing but lead . . . .

Sept. 27.*—Farewell my husband, my darling, my own precious Willie. Think of me; come soon to me. God bless you! God comfort you, my darling, my own.

In the hand of Mr. Anderton.

This day my darling died.

A Valuable Forest.—A traveller relates that, when passing through an Austrian town, his attention was directed to a forest on a slope near the road; and he was told that death was the penalty of cutting down one of those trees. He was incredulous until he was further informed that they were the protection of the city, breaking the force of the descending avalanche, which, without this natural barrier, would sweep over the quiet homes of thousands. When a Russian army was marching there, and began to cut away the defence for fuel, the inhabitants besought them to take their dwellings instead, which was done.

The more vigorous and elevated a man is, the higher tenderness he is capable of, as on high trees the fruit rounds itself into a milder and sweeter form than on low ones.

Man demands more that sorrow than that rapture should show its motive and its apology.

MIDNIGHT FIGHT WITH BURGLARS.

SEVERAL years ago, when the south of Ireland was, as it has ever been within the memory of the oldest inhabitant, in a disturbed state, a gentleman advanced in years, lived in a retired country-house. He was a bachelor, and, whether trusting to his supposed popularity, or imagining that the general alarm among the gentry was groundless, he continued in his lonely mansion long after his neighbors had quitted theirs for a safer residence in town. He had been indisposed for several days, and, on the night he was attacked, had taken his supper in his bed room, which was on the ground floor, and inside a parlor with which it communicated. The servants went to bed, the house was shut up for the night, and the tea-tray, with its appurtenances, by a providential oversight, was left in the old man's chamber.

Some hours after he had retired to bed he was alarmed at hearing a window lifted in the outer apartment; his chamber door was ajar, and the moon shone brilliantly through the open casement, rendering objects in the parlor distinct and perceptible to any person in the inner room. Presently a man leaped in through the window and three others followed him in quick succession. The old man sprang from his bed, but unfortunately there were no arms in the apartment. Recollecting, however, the forgotten supper-tray, he provided himself with a case-knife, and resolutely took his stand behind the open door. He had one advantage over his murderers—they were in the full moonlight and he shrouded in impenetrable darkness.

A momentary hesitation took place among the party, who seemed undecided as to which of them should enter, for acquainted with the locality of the house, they knew well where the devoted victim slept. At last one of the villains cautiously approached, stood a moment in the doorway, hesitated and advanced a step—not a whisper was heard, a breathless silence reigned around, and the apartment before him was as dark as the grave itself.

"Go on, blast ye! What the deuce ye afeered of?" said the rough voice of an associate behind; he took a second step, and the old man's knife was buried in his heart! No second thrust was requisite; for, with a deep groan the robber sank dead upon the floor.

The obscurity of the chamber, and the sudden destruction caused by the deadly thrust, prevented the ruffians in the outer room from knowing the fate of their companion. A second presented himself, crossed the threshold, stumbled against his dead associate and received the old man's knife in his bosom. The wound though mortal was not as fatal as the other, and the ruffian had time to ejaculate that he was a dead man!

Instantly, several shots were fired, but the old gentleman's position sheltered him from the bullets. A third assassin then advanced, leveled a long fowling-piece through the door-way and actually rested the barrel against the old man's body. The direction, however, was a slanting one and with admirable self-possession, he remained steady till the murderer drew the trigger, and the ball passed him without injury; but the flash of the gun unfortunately disclosed the place of his ambush. Then commenced a desperate struggle—the robber, a powerful and athletic ruffian siezed his victim around the body—there was no equality between the combatants with regard to strength and although the old man struck often and furiously with his his knife, the blows were ineffectual, and he was thrown heavily on the floor with the ruffian above him. Even, at this moment, presence of mind saved this heroic gentleman. He found that the blade of the knife had turned, and he contrived to straighten it upon the floor. The ruffian's hands were already upon his throat—the pressure became suffocating—a few moments more and the contest must have ended; but an accidental movement of his body exposed the murderer's side—the old man struck with all his remaining strength a deadly blow—the robber's grasp relaxed—and, with a yell of mortal agony he fell lifeless across his exhausted antagonist.

Horror-struck by the death-shriek of their comrades, the banditti wanted courage to enter that gloomy chamber which had been already fatal to so many. They poured an irregular volley in and leaping through the open window, ran off leaving their lifeless companions behind.

Lights and assistance came presently—the chamber was a pool of gore and the old man nearly in a state of insensibility was covered with blood and encumbered with the bodies of his intended murderers. He recovered, however, to enjoy for years his well-won reputation, and to receive from the Irish viceroy the honor of knighthood, which never was conferred upon a braver man.

Gottschalk's Hopes in a Future Life.—In the course of a letter to the Home Journal, the pianist comes forward and frankly says—what everybody else is always saying about his own particular business: "I delight to think that, beyond the tomb, concerts will exist only in memory, like the confused recollections we have in the morning of a nightmare which has disturbed our sleep. The Orientals people their paradise with houris; the red man fills his with verdant prairies and forests of game, where the chase is eternal; for my part, I like to imagine myself in a paradise where piano concerts are prohibited, and the 'Carnival of Venice,' with variations, a crime. On the other hand, I picture the Styx only as a grand depot of all kinds of pianos—upright, square, oblique, and whatnot—a kind of Botany Bay for hardened pianists, where a never-satisfied public insist upon hearing the 'Carnival of Venice,' with variations, forever!"

The Iron Egg.—In Dresden there is an iron egg, the history of which is something like this: A young prince sent this iron egg to a lady to whom he was betrothed. She received it in her hand, and looked at it with disdain. In her indignation that he should send her such a gift, she cast it to the earth. When it touched the ground a spring, cunningly hidden in the egg, opened, and a silver yolk rolled out. She touched a secret spring in the yolk, and a golden chicken was revealed; she touched a spring in the chicken, and a crown was found within; she touched a spring in the crown, and within it was found a diamond marriage-ring. There is a moral to the story.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1864.

THE MORALS OF THE AGE.

THAT the world always has been wicked and will always continue to be wicked, it is scarcely worth while to dispute. It was washed once pretty thoroughly, and a tolerable cleansing of its vilenesses and iniquities was effected; the only inconvenience the inhabitants suffered from the process being that most of them were drowned—the only drawback to the completeness of the cure being that any were left alive. For the survivors, according to the only record which is left us of the transaction, indulged in evil practices very soon after leaving the Ark.

The culmination of centuries of vileness seems to have been reached at the present day. Notwithstanding that with each successive age the arts and sciences have advanced with rapid step, that education has spread among the people, and the blazing torch of civilization been passed from hand to hand to be carried finally into the remotest wildernesses—notwithstanding all this, it seems that the world has made little improvement in morals. It is not necessary to turn to reeking Paris, or to refer to the abominations of London for illustrations of the truth of this position. Within sound of the surf that breaks on Plymouth Rock, and inside our own Golden Gate, there is ample material for argument, food for the saddest reflection. One cannot turn over the pages of a newspaper without finding a series of crimes recited at which the heart shudders and humanity sickens. The Sunday papers of the East have regular departments devoted to the literature which is thus furnished, and which the popular taste craves. The leading dailies of Eastern cities contain column after column of the advertisements of those who openly practice the most nefarious businesses. Even the sense of shame which once operated as a check, seems lost. As we have before said, no need to turn to over-populated England and France for arguments and instances. Brooklyn, the City of Churches, rearing spires to Heaven from every street corner, and boasting in half its families the blood of the early Puritans, has given a record to the world of a case which passes in profligacy and heartlessness anything the Old World ever furnished—a young woman seduced, murdered with the connivance of friends and physicians, the body sunk in the waters of an inland river at midnight, fished up again by parties who chartered the boat "to go a-goosing," and her father, with an outline of the damnable crime that had been committed before his eyes, compromising the affair for an hundred and seventy-five dollars—is it necessary to add—depreciated paper currency at that! But without looking beyond the mountains, here on the Pacific coast, surging over the threshold of the new homes and family altars that the past decade has built up in our midst, the wave of licentiousness dashes and breaks. Our Police Court has lately revealed facts at which fathers may well tremble, and mothers pray that Death reach their daughters in their cradles. Not only this, but in society, among those who walk with their eyes to the sun and their skirts carefully gathered lest in the streets they inadvertently brush against impurity, disclosures every day bubble to the surface, indicative of the muddiness of the waters beneath. These cases that come to light are the exceptions, the result of imprudences; deep down the horrible tide rolls, and few dream of the saddening truths and withering details that are there buried. The result, however, is plain to the eye of observation: Husbands without honor, wives without truth, the multitude without religion—a generation of girls growing up without modesty, a race of young men ripening into manhood without decency. At this point it is well to stop to inquire whither we are drifting, and debate the means of prevention—for cure is scarcely to be hoped for.

Free thinking, and a too eager desire to grapple with subjects which are best let alone, may be safely set down as the principal in the category of evils. The growing desire to disregard and set at naught what are termed the "conventionalities of society" is productive of more profligacy than all other causes summed together. Conventionalities, let innovators prate as they will, are the chief safeguards of society. Indifference to what "people choose to say" may do well enough in theory, but it fatally fails in practice—or, rather, it works its purpose too well. Let a woman or man once assert indifference to popular opinion and carry out the idea in conversation and conduct, and a wholesome restraint is gone. In some cases no harm may result, but these are the exceptions, and rather prove the rule than otherwise. In society—we use the word in its commonly-accepted sense—each individual is the censor of the other, and rightfully so. It looks very well on paper, and sounds brave in speech, to sneer at the voice of society and snap the fingers at its requirements; but woe to the one who fails to heed them. Society, for its own preservation, is pledged to the most rigid self-protection. It is wisely pronounced that if certain of its recognized and well-defined limits are overstepped the offender must be expelled. It is this understanding that bands it together. Certain observances of religion and morality are insisted upon, and an infraction of them is productive of a penalty. The cry of "harshness" and unchristian rigor when these are violated is misplaced. The right path is open to all—those who choose to step aside have but themselves to blame, for the result is plainly in view from the first. Society can only make concessions on these occasions to its own detriment and the encouragement of offenders. The system of rewards and punishments is of divine origin, and all attempts to improve on the plan of the Creator are worse than useless. It is better that individuals start out in life with a full and complete certainty of what their fate will be if they transgress rather than an assurance that their errors will find mercy with the Court.

In accordance with the tendencies of the age, religion may be called superstition, and argument may be piled on argument to sustain this nomenclature. But grant that the fact is established and what is gained? The teachings of religion are all of purity. Religion never made a man a drunkard or a woman a profligate. The want of it has plunged thousands into gulfs from which the angels could not raise them up. If religion be superstition, guard and preserve it. If free thinking untrammels the passions as well as the mind, avoid and crush it. Let us have peace and purity with superstition, if that be the term, rather than vice and degradation without it. Let the breakers of images be adjudged felons and banished from firesides, beyond a power to do harm. For:

> Tell zeal it lacks devotion,
> Tell love it is but lust,
> Tell life it is but motion,
> Tell flesh it is but dust, and what have you gained? What good is accomplished? Better a race of fanatics, chanting hymns through their noses and trumpeting honest errors in inharmonious tones of conviction, rather than a godless race of enlightened wretches, who believe only in their own materiality and the pleasures and rewards which the baser passions furnish them. Give us Roundheads with their bigotry and honesty, rather than Cavaliers with their love-locks, guitars and ribaldry; Puritans with their psalms, and Covenanters with their canticles, rather than the class who sneer at superstition and prejudice and manifest their disbelief in a God, by giving themselves over to the service of the Devil. Give us any austerity that will elevate woman to the ideal in which she should be held, and the shrine where the worst man desires to place his mother; restore to us any trammels that will make men decent and teach a woman when to blush, and take all philosophy and enlightenment and other excuses for licentiousness to the Devil, where they belong. In short, restore the morals of the age to the purity which prevailed when the Pilgrims landed on shores that were too rugged and barren to encourage vice, and we will gladly give up all the poetry and romance and incontinence that has been blown to us from across the seas, and from loose-zoned tropics.

"HARD TIMES."

FOR a long while there was a great demand for a National hymn, and the brains of all the poets in the country were racked to produce one. If the present state of things continues we suggest that the good old song bearing for its refrain:

> "Go away, Hard Times, come again no more!"

be adopted. For it is certain that some millions of voices would swell the chorus, and that it would be given with the emphasis and earnestness of a prayer. The present hard times are not confined to our coast; the pressure is national, and our people are at least spared the evil of an inflated currency.

The population on the Atlantic coast are used to these little affairs. Crises come to them regularly; their recurrence can be calculated with more mathematical certainty than the return of a comet. Once in so often the banks suspend, the merchants shut up shop, nobody pays anybody, and everybody goes into liquidation. There are auctions in up-town domiciles: people sell their pianos and parlor furniture and go over to Europe to recuperate and save expenses. Debtors and creditors register their names together at Gunn's; go off, meet on the Boulevards amicably, and sit down side by side on the slant sides of the Pyramids, to talk over the financial condition of the boys they 've left behind them and settle accounts. The crisis by-and-by folds up its tents like the brokers and steals noiselessly away. Then people leave the cheap watering-places abroad and return to the magnificent cities and distances of America to live. They build larger houses than before and furnish them better; nothing is said about old debts, and everything goes on as merrily as a chime of marriage-bells until another crisis comes, when the same scenes are repeated. The fact of the matter is, crises are nothing when you are used to them. The French saying: Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coute, may be liberally translated: It is only the first crisis that costs. Subsequent ones are rather amusing than otherwise, breaking the unpleasant monotony which an uninterrupted career of prosperity produces. Recovering from a crisis is only a simple question of how long it is possible to hold one's breath. Breathing is a mere matter of habit—acquired early in life it is true, but it can be overcome by stout resolution, and in the course of time one comes to look upon his lungs with a certain feeling of indifference, if not of positive contempt. In like manner one can learn to live without money, and then he wonders that he ever found a purse with money in it requisite to his happiness.

Crises have their uses: they are levellers—they restore things to their proper condition, and adjust all differences in society. The man who had nothing but money before, learns some very useful lessons with its loss; he finds that without it he is no better than anybody else—perhaps not quite so good. In the pride of purse he had thought himself respectable; he suddenly finds that he isn't. His money procured him admittance into circles from which, had his pecuniary condition been different, he would have been excluded: under the new dispensation of things he suddenly discovers that he has been flying considerably higher than he can roost, and has to come down. Brains that formerly were at a discount, immediately advance to a premium. The possessor of them finds to his delight that they are no longer a disadvantage in life, and that he can overcome all the obstacles which they have hitherto offered to his advancement. And the most charming effect is produced by a crisis on the young lady whose parents before were wealthy. She suddenly discovers that calico is a becoming thing for morning wear; that happiness does not consist in "this world's goods," and that she can live comfortably with Augustus, whom she had previously snubbed, in a cottage. The chances, however, are, that Augustus doesn't see it, and so the world is spared the perpetuation of a race that had better die out.

A good crisis is like a stout, stiff, nor'west breeze. Weak ones go under; but the man with a brain and a soul in his body stands up to it, buckles down to his work, and comes out as staunch and true as Lagerdere does in the play when he twiddles his fingers and says: "I am here!" He takes the gale square in his teeth, and makes a fair wind of it before he has done. Give up and let his ship go down, because the skies threaten?—not he, if there is any virtue in rigging, spars, and that tough whip of a flag-staff which his spine represents! Flectere si nequeo superos Acheronta movebo! That is the motto of your true man when storm-clouds arch blackly above him, and Fate threatens. His bow was unbent when prosperity reigned, but with the occasion he strings it up and very soon you'll see the hickory telling. Hard times have their uses; they sift a community. And in this one respect of trying men, they are as blessed and as beneficial as battles.

FASTING VERSUS FEASTING.

THAT a nation should go hungry because things go wrongly, is one of those singular traditions which have been handed down to the present day, from a generation so remote that we are unable accurately to trace the date of the custom. Probably it originated in that predatory period when one half the then thinly-populated world was at war with the other half, and both sides depended on victory for a dinner—the losing one being obliged to go without and so keep a fast under compulsion. The army that didn't win, making a virtue of military necessity, and having nothing to eat, perhaps resolved that they wouldn't eat, and hence the system of fast days—observances which the many are slow to keep.

With all due deference, however, to what has the sanction of ages, we seriously doubt whether Heaven looks down with any gratification upon hunger; and it is by no means clear to our mind that eternal interests are to be furthered by temporal starvations. What can be gained to a righteous cause by breaking in upon hygienic habits, foregoing regular meals and tampering with the popular digestion? Dieting is occasionally beneficial; but to impose it upon a nation indiscriminately seems to us about as absurd as it would be to prescribe a universal dose of blue mass for the masses, or a simultaneous drenching of the whole population with senna. We do not see, looking at the thing in a philosophical light, how an empty stomach can be made conducive to Christianity, or how it can be considered pleasing to a Creator who endowed His creatures with appetites. The rebels indulge in the same fallacy; and as it is manifestly impossible for both sides to win, the result will prove that one party or the other has sacrificed its victuals in vain.

Flagellation and fasting used to go together. What was called "mortification of the body," under the old and austere system of religion which obtained when inquisitions and the burning of heretics were in fashion, was thought to be one of the first and principal elements of worship, and on the principle probably that a whipping, even when self-administered, must be one of the most mortifying things that a man could submit to, the devotee was accustomed to strip himself in a cell and apply the scourge to his own shrinking shoulders, though there is no reason to believe that the blows were given with that sound good will and vigor which a second party might have brought to their infliction. This system of "mortifying the flesh" was a slight letting-down from the practices of the more devout Hindoos, who lacerate their bodies with knives and suspend themselves in the air from iron hooks fastened into their flesh. Flagellation, as a religious discipline, is in a great measure done away with, though still kept up in some of the rigid Catholic countries; but the twin practice of fasting remains with us. Undoubtedly, however, as time wears on, this too will be permitted to drift into desuetude. And perhaps the day is not far distant when a counter custom will be inaugurated, of eating a good square meal after a defeat and then turning in with a serious purpose to flagellate our enemies.

Let none misunderstand the purport of these remarks. We simply present a common sense view of the case, which must be patent to every plain, practical mind. It is not our intention to deal lightly with a serious subject, and as for disrespect to religion, none more than we would be ready to resent anything that could be so coustrued. But we do claim that sin is not to be atoned for by starvation; and we do think that a revival of the old system of sacrifices which obtained under the Jewish dispensation would be quite as sensible as the present maintenance of fast days. Were the fast day rigorously observed, it would resolve itself into a sort of gala-day for cooks. But, to tell the plain truth, and take our last fast impelias an illustration, it becomes something worse. With the great multitude it was a day of idleness and dissipatiou. Nearly all the stores and other establishmeuts in towu were closed: and nearly all the young men employed in them were out at the Willows, or sporting it on the Cliff House road with fast horses. That one in a hundred of our populatiou fasted, is not the fact; and we would willingly bet that the authors of the long-winded editorials on the day and its purpose did not eat or drink one ounce or dram less than on any other day of the year—unless, indeed, the cheap restaurants refused them credit. The same difficulty is found in making men fast that is proverbially experienced in making a horse drink, though it is easy enough to lead the animal to the water. One man may appoint a fast-day, but unless every man iu the nation is muzzled for the day, how is an observance of it to be managed. We acknowledge the need of penitence and the efficacy of prayer. But that a nation can deliberately sit down on a given day and be penitent to order, we do not believe. For our nation to repent properly of its sins, would occupy the spare time of a whole generation, and to attempt to do the business up in a day is simply absurd. In its formality, the proceeding is analagous to the practice which prevails in another part of the world—in India, we believe—where the inhabitants have praying-machines along the roadside for the benefit of hurried travellers, redueing the act of devotion down to the simple turuing of a crauk. By devoting one day to the work the industrious Hindoo can grind out a sufficient quantity of prayers to last him a life-time. We do not like the idea of bringing penitenee and prayer down to the level of the mechanical arts-Penitence should clothe all on earth continually, and prayer should never be absent from our side. Both are the language of the heart, and not of the lips. Cromwell was wont to pray to a purpose, and Miles Standish and his men have left us a legaey of example in the art. Some hundreds of thousands of brave men are at this moment marching out to their devotions on the field of battle while cannon swell their loud bass through the blue aisles of Heaven like a million organ-pipes. Would it not be a good plan, if another fast day is appointed, to turn it to a practical good by making every man in the nation contribute his food for the day to be forwarded as rations to the men who fight while we fast? And before we attempt to keep auother holyday of our own making, especially on this coast, would it not be well to first see that the one in seven of God's appointing is observed with some show of decency?

Of all sanitary reformers. Dr. Winship will probably become the most popular. For he advocates nothing that goes against the grain of our humanity. In particular he takes stand against those two old dogmas which inculcate the hygienic necessity of rising from the table hungry, and from bed sleepy. He says, "Never rise from the table unsatisfied; never get out of bed so long as you have auy inclination to lie there." And the Doctor's prescription is not only pleasant but sensible. If one is to rise from eating, hungry, what use of sitting down at all? And in relatiou to early rising. our sympathies have always been with the boy who, when his father attempted to cut off his morning nap with that rusty old saw about the bird and the worm, replied that it served the worm right—he hadn't any business to get up so early. As regards the distinguished author of the saying that four honrs of sleep were enough for a man, five for a woman, six for a child, and seven for a fool—we have always inclined to think that he was entitled to avail himself of the latter clause and sleep a good seven, for which reason he felt no compunction in curtailing the sleep of others. Dr. Winship's teachings are much more agreeable, thongh he errs a little on the other extreme perhaps, as some people have an inclination to lie in bed all day.

The correspondent of a literary journal laments that the day of poetry is dead, and asks, "Why have we no more of the soul-strains which were once breathed by the old masters?" We will inform the gentleman. Soul strains don't pay. Poetry has become a mere question of bread and butter. Our bards do not strain themselves with "soul-strains," for the reason that they could not sell them for enough to keep their Pegasus in oats, or themselves in trowsers. Again, this is not a poetical age. The Real is asserting itself to the exclusion of the Ideal. And the music of the present day is condensed in two bars—iron rhymes—which stretch themselves from the Atlantic beyond the Missouri, and will soon reach the shores of the Pacific. People hurrying to their goal, the attainment of wealth, with the whistle of steam in their ears, have no time to listen to the pipings of a reed, or rhythmical discourses to the moon. And, after all, it is better to live poems than to write them.

THE "CALIFORNIAN"—ITS PROSPECTS—WHAT THE EASTERN PRESS SAYS.

THE steamer of June 3d carried to Eastern cities the first number of The Californian—the overland mail brings a few answering words, telliug us what people on the other side think of it. We must acknowledge that we felt somewhat anxious about the verdict of the critieal East. The press of this State and the adjacent Territories had been uniformly cordial in its receptiou, and kinder, heartier, or more appreciative words of greeting than were here spoken to The Californian could not have been asked for. But it occurred to us that perhaps our friends were not impartial in their judgements; that they praised the new paper because it was a Californian, moved by that fellow feeling, or free-masoury of sympathy, which makes all Californians kin. Now the East has spoken; notices from three of the Boston and one of the New York papers have reached us. So flattering are they that it was only by a complete sacrifice of that modesty which is proverbial as pertaining to the profession that we were brought to reproduce them upon the editorial page. But business is business, and blushes must never be permitted to interfere with it. Again, we wish to show the many on this coast who have already pronounced favorably upon the merits of The Californian that they are backed in their opinion by the verdict of an older civilization. Boston, especially, never speaks lightly or unmeaningly. Faneuil Hall appreciates the value of words and never wastes them in formal courtesy or polite acquiescence. Boston generally is nothing if not critical, and very often it is nothing if not hypercritical. For this reasou the annexed notices from the Transcript, Post and Gazette will have a special weight with those who know their meaning. The N. Y. Evening Post has a reputation in literature—owing perhaps to the fact that its editor, William Cullen Bryant, has written some very tolerable verses—and we accept its endorsement with a certain pleasureable pride. Theodore Tilton, editor of the N. Y. Independent, writes a private letter saying how pleased he is with The Californian, aud promising that the Independent shall reflect his opinion of its merits. We print the notices that have thus far been received from the East, and shall reproduce all others that may come. They certainly will prove eminently interesting to all friends of the paper, and others we do not care to please. The notices which the press of this coast have favored us with will be found in other columns, where they are kept regularly standing for the benefit of all who like good reading.

One word to our friends in this connection may not be out of place. The Californian is now an established fact. Though the enterprise was undertaken at a most unfortunate time, it has more than fulfilled the expectations of the originator. At the first its literary success was complete—more eomplete perhaps, that than of any weekly journal ever before started this side of the mountains. So far as a financial success—which after all is the only success worth mentioning—is concerned, it is generally calculated that newspapers must lose money for the first year. The Californian has already bridged over the fatal gap of first expenditures and is now very nearly paying its way. And this within the first two months of its publication! In the history of new journalistic enterprises this does not often occur. But we do not make this exhibit of prosperity for the sake of showing the public that we can do without their help for the future. On the contrary we want continued and extended patronage, and shall spare no endeavors to deserve it. Let no one be betrayed into the mistake of thinking that we are already so wealthy as to scorn further subscriptions and treat advertisements with contempt. Our rapidly-increasing subscription list, and the letters of encouragement that reach us from all parts of the State, prove that The Californian is already a popular favorite. Give us the right hand of patronage, good friends; not only take the paper yourselves, but also see that your neighbors take it; and in return we will endeavor to give you one of the best weekly journals published in America—a journal worthy of its name and of the State.

We have received the first nnmber of The Californian, a weekly journal just started in San Francisco, under the editorial charge of Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman well known to New York journalism Mr. Webb was for several years attached to the editorial staff of the New York Times, where he occupied the responsible post of literary editor, and where his criticisms were the object of special remark for their freshness and piquancy. His new enterprise, The Californian, bears the impress of his editorial skill on every page. It is a handsome paper of sixteen pages, about the size of the Round Table before it was cut down, and not unlike that journal in character and scope. It is printed upon a quality of paper which in these days seems almost prodigally fine. If such a journal can be sustained in California it is certainly a good token for the literary taste of the land of gold. At all events judging from the first number, no man is more capable of directing its career in a successful path than its projector and editor.—Boston Transcript.

The Californian.—A new literary paper with this title comes to us from San Francisco. It is refreshing to the eyes of a printer to read its beautiful print upon clean white paper, and its contents are rich and varied, bearing mark of care and scholarship, enlivened with a vein of humor, that promises for it a position in the first rank of our native publications. It is edited by Charles Webb, Esq., formerly of the New York Times, and latterly the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, whose department of racy "Things" in that paper was read with delight by all this way on whom the Era dawned. "Things"—snappy and epigrammatic as ever—have a place in The Californian, and we would press upon our readers that they could do no better than send on and subscribe for it. The paper bears at its head the motto, appropriate for its own character, as well as for the State: "Surely there is a vein for the silver and a place for the gold where they fine it."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

The Californian, a weekly journal just started in San Francisco, is a remarkably handsome paper of sixteen pages, printed in a superior manner and made up of editorial and selected matter indicating ability and excellent judgment. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a well-known New York journalist, is the editor, and he seems to have entered upon his work with a vigor that, if continued, will render his paper inferior to no literary newspaper in America. Mr. Webb has gained a name for freshness, piquancy and spirit in his writings, and will undoubtedly make The Californian a household friend not in San Francisco only but in every Eastern city.—Boston Post.

The Californian is the title of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published in a handsome quarto form, and conducted by Mr. C. H. Webb, formerly one of the editors of the New York Times. Mr. Webb is a pleasant and versatile writer, and won an excellent reputation during his experience of journalism in this city. He went to California one or two years ago, but ventured for the first time upou an independent enterprise in May last, when the first number of the Californian appeared. The paper claims to be "devoted to live topics and the best interests of California," and inasmuch as it shows a disposition to redeem this promise, being very lively and honest, it deserves success.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Decidedly, the one who aspires to mount the ladder of Fame from the area of the Prize Ring, has to climb by many and very unpleasant "rounds." A detailed account of a late fight in Bell's Life, tells us that the combatants struck each other with mawleys and bunches of fives upon the head—the nut, the eone, the conk, the cannister, the noddle, the mug, the knowledge-box; the nose—the sneezer, the snorer, the snuffer, the snuff-tray, the nozzle, the mazzard, the bugle; the eyes—the ogles, the optics, the peepers; the mouth—the kisser, the whistler, the oration-trap, the potato-place; drawing the blood—the claret, the ruby, the crimson, the home-brewed, the gravy; and in several instances knocking the unfortunate knockee off his pins, his pegs, his stumps, and his foundations, to say nothing of boring, fibbing and sending each other to grass. Who wants the Belt?

From an old number of the Cologne Gazette we learn that the daughter of the Duchess of Montpensier, who was baptized in Spain some four years since, received the following names at the font: Maria de las Mercedes, Isabel, Francisca de Asis, Antonia, Luisa, Fernanda Felipa, Amalia, Christina, Francisca de Paula, Ramona de Rita, Cargetana, Manuela, Juana, Josepha, Joaquina, Aña, Rafaela, Santissima Trinidad, Gaspara, Melchora, Balthasnra, Filomena, Teresa, Todos les Santos. When that yonng lady grows to womanhood, she will be an invaluable acquisition to some one. He can woo her by a different title every day during the courtship, and can call her names all the year round after marraige without creating family disturbances.

We are indebted to that worthy man, manager and actor, Peter Richings, for two large lithographic photographs of himself and his daughter, the popular prima donna. The face of Mr. Richings looks out from the picture as smilingly and determinedly as that of the great origiual, and in the thoughtful and expressive countenance of Miss Caroline we see one well fitted to play the role of The Enchantress. Both pictures are those of artistes, neither of whom seems destined to ever "Peter" out, for their popularity rests upon a basis of actual worth.

The pedigree of John C. Breckinridge is traced by one of his admirers down quite a sinuous stream, starting with John Knox as the fountain head. If he and his troops fool away much more of their time in raiding through Pennsylvania, the line that began with John Knox will soon end with knocks, John.

The Board of Brokers have done away with their evening session, and now only hold one meeting a day. That one is sufficient, under the present condition of the mining share market, for all practical purposes. We fear that it will be many long months before the flush times of old will revive with that worthy Body—or with any other body.

A murder was committed at Black Point early on Thursday morning by a maniac soldier, Simon Kennedy. He had been confined in a guard house cell for safe-keeping, and murdered a fellow-soldier and prisoner named Fitzgerald, by stabbing him with a bayonet which had imprudently been left within his reach.

The editors in Washoe have beeu having a controversy over Judge North, which bade fair at one time to result in furnishing employment for a coroner. Perhaps, too, it was thought that by thinning out the fraternity a little the survivors would have a better chance.

Our Eastern friends sometimes ask queer conundrums. "The passengers by the train from Cincinnati," says an Illinois paper, "arrived last night; the mails did not. What is the reason?" A practical man would account for the circumstance by supposing they were not on the train.

California military stock is looking up at the East. It is rumored that Hooker is to succeed Meade in the command of the Army of the Potomac. Everything goes: we wonder who'll be Hooker's successor!

A movement has been set on foot in Virginia for redneing the wages of miners; and it has been suggested that Chinamen be employed in the mines. Both of these proposed innovations have been received with marked disfavor by the people.

A town in New Jersey complains of being troubled by a set of rowdies who call themselves "Hog Island Roughs." Rough Island Hogs would be a more appropriate name, if they really conduct themselves as described.

Fremont is out with a letter defining the position in which he stands. Just at present his position is a standing joke.

EXECUTION OF LA POMMERAIS.

THE MAN AND THE CRIME.

THE criminal, Couty de la Pommerais, was a young physician of Paris, descended from a fine family and educated beyoad the requirements of a French Faculty. He was handsome and manly, and gave evideaces of ambition at an early age. He was popularly called the Comte de la Pommerais, and at the time of his apprehension was expecting a decoration from the Papal Government with the rank he desired. Like all French students he was incontinent and had several mistresses. The last of these was a widow named Pauw, who appears to have loved him sincerely. She had some little fortune, which they coasumed together; and then la Pommerais married a rich young lady with whom he lived one year. Her mother died suddenly at the end of that tiae, and as la Pommerais was interested in getting certain moneys which she controlled, the manner of her death led to suspicions of poisoning. However the womaa was interred. But the son-in-law was not so fortunate as he supposed, aad he ceased to live with his wife, but returned to Madame Pauw, who still adored him. Upon this fond foolish woman he seems to have premeditated a deep and intricate crime; and it was for this that he suffered dcath. She must have been dishonest like himself for she consented to a scheme of swindling the insurance companies; but unlike himself, she lacked the wit to be silent, and was heard mysteriously that she should soon be grand and happy. La Pommerais persuaded her to have her life insured which was done for 515,000 francs, or upward of $100,000. When the matter had transpired some time, he persuaded her to feign sickuess. The simple woman asked why she should do so,

"The iasurance people," he replied, "will when they consider that you are dangerously ill, prefer to give you 100,000 francs, rather than pay the 515,000 francs in the certainty of your death. You caa give them up your policy, accept the compromise, get well again, and be rich."

Yet this counterfeited siekness was meant by the villain to prepare the neighbors of Mme. Pauw for the death which he intented to ensue. He was to make it known to all that she was dangerously ill; she was to uphold his testimony; and he was to kill her in due time, and take the whole of the insurance. At length the farce finished. La Pommerais gave to Mmc. Pauw a poison difficult to detect, called digitalline, the essential principle of our common fox-glove; she died unconscious of his deception, loving him to the last, and he claimed the 515,000 francs at the insurance office. On the contrary, he was suspected, accused, and tried. The old suspicions relative to his mother-in law were revived; the bodies were exhumed and examined; upon evidence entirely circumstantial and technical, he was convicted, and sentenced to be guillotined. His learning and standing made the trial a famous one; his bearing duriag the long proceedings was calm and collected; he was handsome, and had much sympathy; but the jury found him guilty, and the Emperor refused to extend his clemency to the ease. He was put in a strait-jacket and locked up in La Roquet, the prison for the condemned.

THE CROWD AT THE SCAFFOLD.

The prison of La Roquette (or the Rocket Prison) is situated in the eastern suburbs of Paris, a mile beyond the Bastile. It does not look unlike our American jails. A high exterior wall of rough stone, over the top of which one gets a glimpse of the prison gables; with a huge gate in the arched portal, guarded forever by sentiuels. Before this gate is a small open plot of ground, planted with trees. Rue de la Roquette passes between it and a seeoad prison, immediately facing the first, called the Prison des Jeunes Détenus, or as we would say in America, the "House of Refuge." Standing between the two jails aud looking away from Paris, one will see the great metropolitan cemetery of Pere la Chaise. scarcely a stone's-throw distant, and behind him will be the great abbetoir, or public slaughter-house of Menilmontant, with the vast area of roofs and spires of Paris stretching beyond it to the horizon. It was to this region of vacant lots and lonesome, gloomy houses, that thousands of Parisians bent their steps the night before the execution. The news had gone abroad that La Pommerais would not be pardoned. It was also generally credited that this would be the last execution ever held in Paris, since there is a general desire for the abolition of capital punishment in France, and a conviction that the Legislature, at its next session, will substitute life-imprison ment. This, with the rarity of the event and that terrible allurement of blood which distinguishes all populaces, brought out all the excitable folk of the town; and at dusk, on the night before the expiation, the whole neighborhood of La Roquette was crowded with men and women. All classes of Parisians were there—the blouses, or workingmen, standing first in number; the students from the Latin Quartier being well represented, and idlers and well-dressed nondescripts without enumeration—distributing themselves among women, dogs, and babies. Vendors of gateaux, mussels, and fruit were out in force. The "Savage of Paris," clothed in his war plumes, paint, greaves, armlets, and moccasins, was selling razors by gaslight; here aud there ballad-mongers were singing the latest songs, and boys with chairs to let elbowed into the intricacies of the crowd, whieh amused itself all the night long by smoking, drinking and hallooing. At last the mass became formidable iu numbers, covering every inch of ground within sight of the prison, and many soldiers and sergeants-de-ville, mounted and on foot, pushed through the dense mass to restore order.

THE GUILLOTINE.

At midnight, a body of eavalry forced baek the people from the square of La Roquette. A number of workmen, issuing from the prison-gates, proceeded to set up the instrument of death by the light of blazing torches. The flames lit up the dark jail walls, and shone on the helmets and cuirasses of the sabremen, flared upon spots of the upturned faces, now bringing them into strong, ruddy relief, now plunging them into shadow. When the several pieces had been framed together, we had a real guillotine in view—the same spectre at which thousands of good and bad men had shuddered; and the folks around it, peering up so eagerly, were descendants of those who had stood on the Place de la Concorde to witness the head of a king roll into the commou basket. Imagine two tall, straight timbers, a foot apart, rising fifteen feet from the ground. They are grooved, and spring from a wide platform, approached by a flight of steps. At the bases rests a spring-plaak or bascule, to which leather thongs are attached to buckle down the victim, and a basket or pannier, filled with saw dust, to receive the severed head. Between these, at their summit, hangs the shining knife in its appointed grooves, and a cord, which may be diseonnected by a jerk, holds it to its position. Two men will be required to work the instrument promptly—the one to bind the condemned, the other to drop the axe. The bascule is so arranged that the whole weight and length of the trunk will rest upon it, leaving the head and neck entirely free, and when prone it will reach to the grooves, leaving sufficient space for the knife to pass below it. The knife itself is short and wide, with a bright eoncave edge, and a rim of heavy steel ridges it at the top; it moves easily in the greased grooves, and may weigh forty pounds. It has a terrible fascination, hanging so high and so lightly in the blaze of the torches, whieh play and glitter upon it, and cast staias of red light along its keen blade, as if by its brilliancy all its past blood-marks had become visible again. A child may send it shimmering and crashing to the scaffold, but only God can fasten together the warm and throbbing parts which it shall soon dissever. And now that the terrible creature has been created, the workmen slink away, as if afraid of it, and a body of soldiers stand guard upon it, as if they feared it might grow thirsty and insatiate as in the days of its youth. The multitude press up again, reinforced every hour, and at last the pale day climbs over the jail walls, and waiting people see each other by its glimmer. The bells of Notre Dame peal out; a hundred towers fall into the march of the music; the early journals are shrieked by French newsboys, and folks begin to count the minutes on their watches. There are men on the ground who saw the first guillotine at work. They describe the click of the cleaver, the steady march of victims upon the scaffold-stairs. the rattle of the deathcart turning out of the Rue St. Honoré, the painted executioners, with their dripping hands, wiping away the jets of blood from the hard. rough faces; nay, the step of the young Queen, white-haired with care, but very beautiful, who bent her body as she had never bent her knee, and paid the peaalty of her pride with the neck which a kiag had fondled.

THE SCAFFOLD.

At four minutes to 6 o'clock on Thursday morning, the wicket in the prison gate swung open; the condemned appeared, with his hands tied behind his back, and his knees bound together. He walked with difficulty so fettered; but other than the artificial restraiuts, there was no hesitation nor terror in his movements. His hair, which had been long, dark, and wavy, was severed close to his scalp; his beard had likewise been clipped, and the fine moustache and goatee, which had set off his most interesting face, no longer appeared to enhance his romantic, expressive physiognomy. Yet his black eyes and the cleanly-cut mouth, nostrils, and eyebrows, demonstrated that Conty de la Pommerais' was not a beauty dependent upon small accessories. There was a dignity even in his painful gait; the coarse prison-shirt, scissored low in the neck, exhibited the straight columnar throat and swelling chest; for the rest, he wore only a pair of black pantaloons and his own shapely boots. As he emerged from the wicket, the chill morning air, laden with the dew of the truck gardens near at hand, blew across the open spaces of the suburbs, and smote him with a cold chill. He was plainly seen to tremble; but in an instant, as if by the mere force of his will, he stood motionless, and cast a first and oaly glanee at the guillotine straight before him. It was the glance of a man who meets an enemy's eye, not shrinkingly, but half defiant, as if even the bitter retribution could not abash his strong courage. The dramatic manuer which is characteristic of the most real and earnest incidents of French life had its fascination for La Pommerais, even at his death hour. Not Mr. Booth nor Mr. Forrest could have expressed the rallying, startling, almost thrilling recognition of an instrument of death better than this actual criminal whose last winkful of daylight was blackened by the guillotine. It reminded one of Damon, in the pitch of the tragedy:

"I stand upon the scaffold—I am standing on my throne!"

His dark eye was scintillant; his nostril grew full; his shoulders fell back as if to exhibit his broad, compact figure in manlier outline; he seemed to feel that 40,000 men and women and young children were looking upon him to see how he dared to die, and that for a generation his bearing should go into fireside descriptioas. Then he moved on between the files of soldiers at his shuffling pace, and before him went the aumonier or chaplain, swaying the crucifix, behind him the executioner of Versailles—a rough and bearded man—to assist in the final horror.

It was at this intense moment a most wonderful spectacle. As the prisoner had first appeared, a single great shout had shaken the multitude. It was the French word "Voila!" which means "Behold!" "See!" Then every spectator stood on tiptoe; the silence ol death succeeded; all the close street was undulant with human motion; a few house roofs near by were dizzy with folk who gazed down from the roofs; all the way up the heights of Pere la Chaise, among the pale chapels and monuments of the dead, the thousauds of stirred beings swung and shook like so many drowaed corpses floating on the sea. Every eye and mind turned to the little structure raised among the trees, on the space before La Roquette, and there they saw a dark, shaven, disrobed young maa, goiug quietly towards his grave.

He mounted the steps deliberately, looking toward his feet; the priest held up the crucifix, and he felt it was there, but did not see it: his lips one moment touched the image of Christ, but he did not look up nor speak; then. as he gained the last step, the bascule or swingboard sprang up before him; the executioner gave him a single push, and he fell prone upon the plank, with his face downward; it gave way before him, bearing him into the space between the upright beams, and he lay horizontally beneath the knife, presenting the back of his neck to it. Thus resting, he could look into the pannier or basket, into whose sawdust lining his head was to drop in a moment. And in that awful space, while all the people gazed with their fingers tingling, the legitimate Parisian executioner gave a jerk at the cord which held the fatal knife. With a quick, keen sound, the steel became detached; it fell hurtling through the grooves; it struck something with a dead, dumb thump; a jet of bright blood spurted into the light, and dyed the face of an attendant horribly red; and Couty de la Pommerais' head lay in the sawdust of the pannier, while every veiu in the lopped trunk trickled upon the scaffold floor! They threw a cloth upon the carcase and carried away the pannier; the guillotine disappeared beneath the surrounding heads; loud exclamations and acclaims burst from the multitude; the vendors of trash and edibles resumed their cheerful cries. and a hearse dashed through the mass carrying the warm body of the guillotined to the eemetery of Mt. Parnasse. In thirty minutes, newsboys were hawking the sceae of the execution upon all the quays and bridges. Iu every eafe of Paris some witness was telling the incidents of the show to breathless listeners, and the crowds which stopped to see the funeral procession of the great Marshal Pelissier, divided their attentit he between the warrior and the poisoner—the latter obtain the preponderance of fame.—Paris Correspondence.

SHADOWS.

TOGETHER, at home in the parlor,
We sat chatting gayly and free;
I know I was pleased with his nonsense,
And I guess he was pleased too with me;
You've seen, as you've sat in the lamplight,
How oddly the shadows oft fall;
Well—will you believe it?—his shadow
Was kissing mine then on the wall.

I think it was awful, but somehow,
It all appeared perfectly right;
You know, things don't look in the daytime
The same as they seem in the night;
I suppose it was horrible—very—
And scarcely dare tell you that when
I saw them once more there, his shadow
Was kissing my shadow again.

This, sure, was beyond all endurance,
And should have been stopped—it is true;
But when shadows set up to act so,
What can a poor little girl do?
It should, I acknowledge, have threatened,
And shaken its dear little fist—
Alas! for depraved human nature,
It just put up its mouth to be kissed!

STRAY JOKES.

THE hurricane smote the earth with a force and filled it with a terror beyond any previous conception. All nature seemed to be in convulsions; if the universe had been going to wreck the scene could scarcely have been more hightful. Houses were overturned and dashed to pieces; the largest trees were snapped off or torn up by the roots; men, cattle, and the limbs of trees were lifted up into the air and blown about like feathers; the waters of the river was thrown from its bed; the thunder roared with frequent peals, which began in deafening crashes and continued in prolonged echoes gradually growing fainter in echoes until they died in the distance; during the intervals the air was full of the shrieks and groans of the men and women buried in the ruins of buildings, or crushed by falling trees; the lightning flashed with dazzling brilliancy against a sky black as midnight; and although I was sheltered by a large rock, it was. with the greatest difficulty that I could hold my hat on.

A BAPTIST preacher known to be very fond of toddy was riding. one very cold day, past the house of a friend who had similar tastes, and who now cried out, "Hallo, brother, don't be in such haste. Won't you stop and chat awhile?"

"No, thank you, I have no time. John Smith is dying, and I must get to his house as soon as I can."

"But wouldn't you like a hot whisky toddy?"

"Well, I don't eare if I do," said the preacher, as he stopped his horse and commenced to dismount.

Before he had got to the ground, however, he was stopped by the friend's reply: "I thought so, and I have n't a drop in the house. I only asked for curiosity."

During the great Californian flood of 1862, the bridge over the Yuba river at Parks' Bar, though thirty feet above the usual level of the water, was carried away. An Irishman on the bank of the river a mile below, saw the fragments floating past, and a few minutes afterwards met the Nevada stage, which had crossed on the bridge a few minutes before it was swept away, and could not have crossed by any other means or at any other place. He asked anxiously "And sure, did ye cross the bridge before it was carried off?"

A WOMAN in Albany sued a neighbor to recover damages for breaking an iron kettle which the latter had borrowed. On trial, the attorney for the defendant proved the following points:

1. His client never borrowed the kettle.
2. It was broken when she borrowed it.
3. It was whole when she returned it.

A MAN took a piece of broadcloth to a tailor to have a coat made. He examined it and said there was not enough; another yard would be necessary. The man took his cloth away, got another tailor to make the coat, and wore it to show the first tailor that there was enough cloth. Snip asked who made it. "Jones," was the reply. "Ah, well! his boy is not so big as mine is!"

A BARBER, while shaving a man whose cheeks were so sunken that it was necessary for him to put his finger inside and press them out so that the razor would reach what was usually the hollow, suddenly withdrew his hand, exclaiming "A plague on your lantern jaw! I have cut my finger through them."

A BOY who got into a fight and was whipped, threatened the victor that he would send for his big brother, who would "cowhide him with a horsewhip."

AN old geography says that in 1750, Albany had 1,500 houses and 5,000 inhabitants, all standing with their gable ends to the street.

AN ARTIFICIAL TONGUE.—A French surgeon deseribes how he removed from a patient the whole of a tongue afflicted with cancer, by means of what he terms cauterization en flèches. He perforated the tongue with eight of his cauterising arrows, (flèches.) so as to cause all the affected portion to slough off in one mass. His patient, after the removal of the tongue, could neither swallow nor speak, but performed both these functions on being supplied with a gutta-pereha tongue of the natural size.

STORIES OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

MURDER PREVENTED BY A DREAM.

A FEW years ago, a gentleman, whose situation in life is rather distinguished, and whose character is such as to stamp with veracity whatever he may impart, dreamed that he went down into his kitchen in the middle of the night, and found his cook sitting there alone, dressed in white, but with a large spot of blood on her bosom.

The dream caused so powerful an emotion, that he awoke, but immediately after he fell asleep, and again dreamed the same dream. He a second time awoke, and, though not superstitiously inclined, he was so deeply impressed, that he felt impelled to go down and satisfy himself by ocular demonstration that there was no cause for uneasiness. He accordingly proceeded to the kitchen; but what was his horror, on softly opening the door, to perceive the cook seated by the fire, and in just such a dress as his sleeping vision had portrayed! He demanded somewhat sternly what could be her business there at such an hour. The woman appeared much agitated at this discovery, trembled, and faltered; but, on her master renewing the question in an authoritative tone, she acknowledged that she and the gardener had been long attached, and that he had promised to meet her at that early hour, in order to accompany her to a village some miles distant to be married. The circumstances were so odd, more especially connected with the dream, that this gentleman felt convinced all could not be right; and having first locked up the cook safely in the kitchen, he proceeded to a little detached building in which the gardener slept; but not finding him there, he went on to the garden, where he found him digging a pit.

He started, and turned most dreadfully pale at the sight of his master, who asked him how long he had been in the habit of rising at so early an hour, and for what he was digging the pit? He answered he was preparing a melon-bed. But his looks and voice confirmed the dreadful suspicion of the dark purpose for which it was destined, and in the most solemn manner his master charged him with the intended murder. Thrown off his guard by the suddenness of this visit, and the unexpectedness of his accusation, he fell down on his knees, and earnestly begging for pardon, acknowledged that he had powerful reasons for wishing the cook entirely out of the way, and that he had really prepared the pit for her reception.

THE FRENCH ACTRESS.

MLLE. CLAIRE CLARION was the great French tragedienne of the last century. She occupied in her day a position similar to that which Rachel has since filled.

Her beauty, her grace, and her genius won for her many enthusiastic admirers; some professing friendship, others love. Among the latter, in the year 1743, was a young man, M. de St. Elme, son of a merchant of Brittany, whose attachment appears to have been of the most devoted kind.

The circumstances connected with this young man's death, and the events which succeeded it, are of an extraordinary character; but they come to us from first hand, and remarkably well authenticated, being detailed by Mlle. Clarion herself, in her autobiography, from which we translate the essential part of the narrative, as follows:

"The language and manners of M. de St. Elme gave evidence of an excellent education, and of the habit of good society. His reserve, his timidity, which deterred all advances except by little attentions and by the language of the eyes, caused me to distinguish him from others. After having met him frequently in society, I at last permitted him to visit me at my own house, and did not conceal from him the friendship with which he inspired me. Seeing me at liberty, and well inclined towards him, he was content to be patient, hoping that time might create in me a warmer sentiment. But, when he came to reply candidly to the questions which my reason and curiosity prompted, he himself destroyed the chance he might have had. Ashamed of being a commoner only, he had converted his property into ready funds, and had come to Paris to spend his money, aping a rank above his own. This displeased me. He who blushes for himself, causes others to despise him. Besides this, his temperament was melancholy and misanthropic; he knew mankind too well, he said, not to contemn and to avoid them. His project was to see no one but myself, and to carry me off where I should see only him. That, as may be supposed, did not suit me at all. I was willing to be guided by a flowery band, but not to be fettered with chains. From that moment, I saw the necessity of destroying entirely the hopes he nourished, and of changing his assiduities of every day to occasional visits, few and far between. This caused him a severe illness, during which I nursed him with every possible care. But my constant refusal aggravated the case; and, unfortunately for the poor fellow, his brother-in-law, to whom he had entrusted the care of his funds, failed to make remittances, so that he was fain to accept the scanty supply of spare cash I had, to furnish him with food and medical assistance. Finally, he recovered his property, but not his health; and desiring for his own sake to keep him at a distance from me, I steadily refused both his letters and his visits.

"Two years and a half elapsed between the time of our first acquaintance and his death. He sent, in his last moments, to beg that I would grant him the happiness of seeing me once more; but my friends hindered me from doing so. He died, having no one near him but his servants and an old lady, who for some time had been his only society. His apartments were then on the Rempart, near the Chaussée d'Antin; mine, in the Rue de Bassy, near the monastery of Saint-Germain.

"That evening my mother and several other friends were supping with me. The supper was gay. I had just been singing to them, and they applauding me, when, as 11 o'clock struck, a piercing cry was heard. Its heart-rending tone and the length of time it continued struck every one with astonishment. I fainted, and remained for a quarter of an hour totally unconscious. When I recovered, I begged them to remain with me part of the night. We reasoned much in regard to this strange cry; and it was agreed to have spies set in the street, so that in case of its repetition, we might detect its cause and its author.

"Every succeeding night, always at the same hour, the same cry was repeated, sounding immediately beneath my windows, and appearing to issue from the vacant air. My people, my guests, my neighbors, the police, all heard it alike. I could not doubt that it was intended for me. I seldom supped from home, but when I did, nothing was heard there; and several times, when I returned later than 11, and inquired of my mother, or the servants, if anything had been heard of it, suddenly it burst forth in the midst of us. Then I remained several months without hearing any more; and I began to hope that the disturbance had ceased. I was mistaken.

"The theatre had been ordered to Versailles, on occasion of the marriage of the Dauphin. We were to remain there three days. We were insufficiently provided with apartments. Mme. Grandval had none. We waited half the night in hopes that one would be assigned to her. At 3 o'clock in the morning I offered her one of the two beds in my room, which was in the Avenue St. Cloud. She accepted it; I occupied the other bed; and as my maid was undressing to sleep beside me, I said to her, 'Here we are at the end of the world, and with such frightful weather! I think it would puzzle the ghost to find us here.' The same cry, on the instant! Mme. Grandval thought that hell itself was let loose in the room. In her night-dress she rushed down stairs, from the top to the bottom. Not a soul in the house slept another wink that night. This was, however, the last time I ever heard it."

Whether the sequel may be regarded as supplying a sufficient explanation or not, it is proper to give it, as furnished by Mlle. Clarion.

That lady desiring to change her residence, and the apartments she occupied being advertised to be let, several persons called to see them. Among the rest there was a lady announced advanced in years. She exhibited much emotion, which communicated itself to Mlle. Clarion. At last she confessed that it was not to look at the apartments she came, but to converse with their occupant. She thought of writing, she said, but had feared that her motives might be misinterpreted. Mlle. Clarion begged for an explanation; and the following conversation ensued:

"I was, Mlle.," said the lady, "the best friend of Monsieur de St. Elme; indeed, the only one he was willing to see during the last year of his life. The hours, the days of that year were spent by us in talking of you, sometimes setting you down as an angel, sometimes as a fiend. As for me, I urged him constantly to endeavor to forget you, while he protested that he would continue to love you even beyond the tomb. You weep," she continued, after a pause; "and perhaps you will allow me to ask you why you made him so unhappy, and why, with your affectionate character, you refused him, in his last moments, the consolation of seeing you once more?"

"Our affections," replied Mlle. Clarion, "are not within our control. Monsieur de St. Elme had many meritorious and estimable qualities; but his character was sombre, misanthropic, despotic, so that he caused me to fear alike his society, his friendship, and his love. To make him happy, I should have had to renounce all human intercourse, even the talent I exercise. I was poor and proud. It has been my wish and my hope to accept no favor—to owe everything to my own exertions. The friendship I entertained for him caused me to try every means to bring him back to sentiments more calm and reasonable. Failing in this, and convinced that his obstinate resolve was due less to the extremity of his passion than to the violence of his character, I adopted, and adhered to, the resolution to separate from him for ever. I refused to see him on his death bed, because the sight of his distress would have made me miserable, to no good end. These, madam, were the motives which actuated me. I trust you will not consider them deserving of censure."

"It would be unjust," she replied, "to condemn you. We can be reasonably called upon to make sacrifices only to fulfil our promises, or in discharge of our duty to relatives or to benefactors. I know that you owed him no gratitude; he himself felt that all obligation was on his part; but the state of his mind and the passion which ruled him were beyond his control; and your refusal to see him hastened his last moments. He counted the minutes until half-past ten, when his servant returned with the message that most certainly you would not come. After a moment of silence, he took my hand, and, in a state of despair which terrified me, he exclaimed: 'Barbarous creature! But she shall gain nothing by it. I will pursue her as long after my death as she has pursued me during my life.' * * * * I tried to calm him. He was already a corpse."

This is the story as Mlle. Clarion herself relates it. She adds: "I need not say what effect these last words produced on me. The coincidence between them and the disturbances that had haunted me filled me with terror. I do not know what chance really is; but I am very sure that what we are in the habit of calling so has a vast influence upon human affairs."

THE APPARITION WITHOUT A HEAD.

A GENTLEMAN connected with the family of Dr. Ferrier, an officer in the army, was quartered early in life, in the middle of the eighteenth century, near the castle of a gentleman in the north of Scotland, who was supposed to possess the gift of second sight. Strange rumors were afloat respecting the old Chieftain (as he was called;) and it was moreover said that he had spoken to an apparition which ran along the battlements of the house, and had never been cheerful afterwards. His prophetic vision excited surprise, which was favored by his retired habits. One day, whilst Dr. Ferrier's friend was reading a play to the ladies of this family, the Chief, who had been walking across the room, stopped suddenly and assumed the look of a seer; he rang the bell, and ordered the groom to saddle a horse, to proceed immediatly to a seat in the neighborhood, and to inquire after the health of Lady Ross; if the account were favorable, he then directed him to call at another castle, to ask after another lady whom he named. Dr. Ferrier immediatly closed his book, and declared that he would not proceed till these abrupt orders were explained, as he was confident they were produced by second sight. The Chief was very unwilling to explain himself, but at length he owned that the door had appeared to open and that a little woman, without a head, had entered the room; that the apparition indicated the sudden death of some person of his acquaintance, and the only two persons who resembled the figure were those ladies after whose health he had sent to inquire.

A few hours afterwards, the servant returned with an account that one of the ladies had died of an apoplectic fit just about the time the vision appeared.

"DARK DEEDS" OF INDIA.

A RECENT writer gives the following account of something that fell under his personal notice in India:

Our conversation was here interrupted by a gardener, who presented the Rajah and myself, respectively, with a nosegay; and who volunteered the information that some workmen, in digging the foundation for a ventrellis, had come upon an old house under the earth, and in it had found several gold and silver coins.

"Where?" asked the Rajah.

"There!" said the gardener, pointing in the direction.

We hurried to the spot, and found that the workmen had gone; but, sure enough, there were the walls of an apartment, formed of red stone and white marble.

"This quarter of Agra," said the Rajah to me, "was formerly inhabited by persons of the highest rank. Where we are now standing was, no doubt, once the site of a palace; and these walls are those of the ty-khana—a vault beneath the dwelling from which the light is excluded. In these dark places are usually perpetrated what you English call "dark deeds."

I expressed a desire to explore this newly-discovered department of former days; but the Rajah told me it was then too late, as the workmen had gone; but he promised me that if I would come to him at daylight on the following morning, he would have great pleasure in gratifying my curiosity.

On the following morning, having spent a very dreamy night, I was carried in my palanquin to the Jatnee Bah. Such was the name of the Jooteepersad's garden-house, in which Lall Singh then resided. The Maharajah was dressing. I was confronted by a Seik with an enormous beard, whose hair was a yard long, and tied up in a peculiar knot on the top of his head, and who politely inquired if I would take coffee. Ere long the Rajah made his appearance, and we went together to the newly-discovered ty-khana, which was now guarded, since gold and silver had been found there. The workmen, some twenty in number, came and commenced their labor, that of clearing away the earth in all directions, in order to get to the bottom of the apartment in the ty-khana. This was accomplished in about two hours, and we then stood upon a stone floor in the centre of a room about sixteen feet square. In several of the niches were little lamps, such as are burnt on the tombs of the Moslems, and a hookah and a pair of marblo chairs were found in this subterraneous apartment. of which the sky was now the roof. Whilst examining the walls, I observed that, upon one side, there was a ledge about six feet high from the floor, (and carried up therefrom,) and about a foot in width. This ledge, which was of brick and plaster, resembled a huge mantelpiece, and was continued from one end of the apartment to the other. I asked the Rajah the reason of such a structure in the apartment. He replied that he did not know, nor could any of the workmen account for it; one of them, however, took a pick-axe and dug out a portion, when, to my surprise and horror, I discovered that in this wall a human being had been bricked up. The skin was still upon the bones, which were covered with a costly dress of white muslin, spangled all over with gold; around the neck was a string of pearls; on the wrists and ankles were gold bangles, and on the feet were a pair of slippers, embroidered all over with silver wire or thread; such slippers as only Mahommedan women of rank or wealth can afford to wear. The body resembled a well-preserved mummy. The features were very distinct, and were those of a woman whose age could not, at the time of her death, have exceeded eighteen or nineteen years. The head was partially covered with the white dress. Long black hair was still clinging to the scalp, and was parted across the forehead and carried behind the ears. It was the most horrid and ghastly figure that I ever beheld.

The workmen appeared to take this discovery as a matter of course; or rather to regard it only with regard to the gold and silver ornaments upon the skeleton, and it was with great difficulty that I could prevent their stripping it forthwith. As for the Rajah, he simply smiled, and coolly remarked:

"A case of jealonsy. Her husband was jealous of her, and thought her guilty, and punished her thus—bricked her up alive in this wall, with no room to move about, only standing room. Perhaps she deserved it—perhaps she was plotting against his life; perhaps she was innocent. Who can say? Hindoos as well as Mahommedans punish their wives in this way."

"You mean, they used to do so in former times, previous to British rule in India. But such a thing could not occur in our time?"

"It does not occur so often as it did; but it does occur, sometimes, even in these days. How do you know what happens in the establishment of a wealthy native? Let us look a little further into the wall. It strikes me that we shall find some more of them."

Orders were given accordingly to the workmen to remove with great care, the whole of the ledge; in short, to pull away its entire face. This was done; and how shall I describe the awful spectacle then presented? In that wall there was no less than five bodies—four besides that already alluded to. One of the number was a young man, who, from his dress and the jewels on his finger bones, must have been a person of high rank; perhaps the lover of one or both of the young women—for he had been bricked up between two of them. The others were evidently those of confidential servants—old women, for they had gray hair. They possibly had been cognizant, or were supposed to be cognizant, of whatever offence the others had been deemed guilty.

The sun was now shining brightly on these ghastly remains, covered with garments embroidered in gold and silver. The air had a speedy effect on them, and one by one they fell, each forming a heap of bones, hair, shrivelled skin, dust, jewels and finery. The latter were now gathered up, placed in a small basket, and sent to the Lallah. Their value, possibly, was upwards of £1,000. How many years had passed since that horrible sentence had been put into execution? Not less than one hundred and seventy or perhaps two hundred.

THE LITTLE GRAVE.

"A MOTHER" sends the following lines to THE CALIFORNIAN, with a request that we insert them in "The Mother's Corner," remarking: "If the poetry is old, the sentiment is not; and as long as the sun rises and sets there will be mothers whose hearts will respond to these touching and tender recollections. I take them from an old scrap-book." Truly, the verses are beautiful, exceedingly:

"It's only a little grave," they said,
"Only just a child that's dead;"
And as they carelessly turned away
From the mound the spade had made that day—
Ah! they did not know how deep a shade
That little grave in our home had made.

I know the coffin was narrow and small—
One yard would have served for an ample pall;
One man in his arms could have borne away
The casket frail, and its precious clay;
But I know that darling hopes were hid
Beneath that tiny coffin-lid.

I knew that a mother had stood that day
With folded arms by that corpse of clay;
I knew that burning tears were hid
"'Neath the drooping lash and aching lid;"
And I knew her lip and cheek and brow
Were almost as white as her baby's now.

I knew that some things were hid away—
The crimson frock, and wrappings gay—
The little sock, and the half-worn shoe—
The cap with its plumes, and tassels blue;
And an empty crib, with its covers spread,
As white as the face of the precious dead.

'Tis a little grave, but oh, beware!
For world-wide hopes are buried there;
And ye, perhaps, in coming years,
May see, like her, through blinding tears,
How much of light, how much of joy,
Is buried up with an only boy!

CURIOSITIES OF THE OCEAN BOTTOM.

MR. GREEN, the famous diver, tells very singular stories of his adventures, when making search in the deep waters of the ocean. He gives some new sketches of what he saw at the "Silver Banks," near Hayti.

The banks of coral on which my divings were made, are about forty miles in length, and about ten or twenty in breadth. On this bank of coral is presented to the diver one of the most beautiful and sublime scenes the eye ever beheld. The water varies from ten to one hundred feet in depth, and is so clear that the diver can see from two to three hundred feet when he is submerged, with but little obstruction to the sight.

The bottom of the ocean, in many places, is as smooth as a marble floor; in others it is studded with coral columns from ten to one hundred feet in height, and from one to eighty feet in diameter. The tops of those more lofty support a myriad of pyramidal pendants, each forming a myriad more; giving the reality to the imaginary abode of some water nymphs. In other places the pendants form arch after arch; and as the diver stands on the bottom of the ocean, and gazes through these in the deep winding avenues, he finds that they fill him with as sacred an awe as if he were in some old cathedral which had been buried beneath "old ocean's wave." Here and there the coral extends even to the surface of the water, as if those loftier columns were towers belonging to those stately temples that are now in ruins. There were countless varieties of diminutive trees, shrubs, and plants, in every crevice of the corals, where the water had deposited the least earth. They were all of a faint hue, owing to the pale light they received, although of every shade, and entirely different from plants I am familiar with, that vegetate on dry land. One in particular attracted my attention; it resembled a sea fan of an immense size and variegated colors, and the most brilliant hues. The fish which inhabit those "Silver Banks" I have found as different in kind as the scenery is varied. They were of all forms, colors, and sizes—from the symmetrical body of the globe-like sunfish; from those of the dullest hue to the changeable dolphin; from the spots of the leopard to the hues of the sunbeam; from the harmless minnow to the voracious shark. Some had heads like squirrels, others like cats and dogs; one of the small size resembled the bull terrier. Some darted through the water like meteors, while others could be scarcely seen to move. To enumerate and explain all the various kinds of fish beheld, while diving on these banks, would, were I enough of a naturalist so to do, require more than my limits will allow, for I am convinced that most of the kinds of fish which inhabit the tropical seas can be found there. The sunfish, sawfish, white shark, blue or shovel-nose shark, were often seen. There were often fish which resembled plants, and remained as fixed in their positions as a shrub; the only powers they possessed was to open and shut when in danger.

Some of them resembled the rose in full bloom, and were of all hues. There were the ribbon fish, from four to five inches to three feet in length. They build their houses like beavers, in which they spawn, and the male or female watches the egg until it hatches. I saw many specimens of the green turtle, some five feet long, which I should think would weigh from four to five hundred pounds.

IMPOLITE THINGS.—We give a few of those impolite things in which young people render themselves disagreeable: 1. Loud and boisterous laughter. 2. Reading when others are talking. 3. Reading aloud in company without being asked. 4. Talking when others are reading. 5. Smoking about the house. 6. Cutting finger-nails in company. 7. Leaving a church before public worship is closed. 8. Whispering or laughing in church. 9. Gazing rudely at strangers. 10. Leaving a stranger without a seat. 11. A want of reverence and respect for seniors. 12. Correcting older persons than yourself, especially parents. 13. Receiving a present without an expression of gratitude. 14. Making yourself the hero of your story. 15. Laughing at the mistakes of others. 16. Joking of others in company. 17. Commencing talking before others have finished speaking. 18. Answering questions that have been put to others. 19. Commencing to eat as soon as you get to the table.

A SOUR temper bites lines into one's face like aquafortis.

ANOTHER INCORPORATED COMPANY.

THE following clever burlesque of the joint-stock speculations and wildcat schemes recently coming into favor in New York was written for the latitude and longitude of that city; but we fancy that it admits of a broad application, and that San Francisco will understand the joke thoroughly and well. We copy it from Carrington's Commissionaire—a spicy little paper printed where the office of the Company referred to seems to be located:

N. B.—We call the attention of parties seeking a healthy and nutritious investment to the following circular:

Dum tacent clamant.

"While you're clamming keep your mouth shut."

Secretary,	Starr Fish, "
Counsel,	C. Robbin, "

Mining Directors,	N. E. Hoe, "

Digger-General and Clam-taster-in-Chief,	Jeems, Esq.

OFFICE, No. 40 NEW YORK.

The property of this Company is located at Digger's Beach, Quicksand county, State of Long Island. The Company holds 3,000 feet of the beach, and shafts have been sunk to the depth of 6, 10 and 12 inches, respectively.

The property formerly belonged to Messrs. Dedbroke & Hardup.

The Hardshell and Hydraulic Clam Mine is considered one of the best in the State. It has long been noted for its immense yield of the products which suggested its present title.

It is confidently believed that this lode will prove to be one of the heaviest loads ever undertaken. This opinion is deduced from the numerous wagon loads which have been already raised from it.

Assays, made by Professor Downing, Ostracean Operator, and Demonstrator of Bivalvular Anatomy at the Univers-eaty of Broad street, show that the products of this mine yield 60 per cent. of nutritive aliment.

Perhaps it would not be out of place to make a small estimate of what the stockholders of this Company may expect.

In a short time all the machinery will be in operation, including our new stamping process for converting hydraulic clams into chicken feed. This method will add a feature of profit, not originally contemplated in the working of this mine, and it is therefore first referred to in these estimates. The new stamps will crush forty tons per die'em, and it is calculated that in Quicksand county alone, there are constantly on hand 100,000 chickens, each of which, at a moderate allowance, will consume one hydraulic clam per day. This makes a grand yearly total of 36,500,000 clams, which at $500 per million, will produce a gross yearly result of $18,250. This alone would yield a handsome annual profit.

But the hydraulic, as well as the hardshell clam, forms a portion of that great necessary of human life—food, and it is estimated that there are at least 10,000 families in this country, each of which would be glad to have a mess of clams for breakfast once a week the year round.

Estimating a mess at an average of 50, this calculation would require annually about 2,500,000 clams of both kinds. These sell readily at an average rate of 25c. per hundred, amounting to $6,250.

A recapitulation of these data, therefore, shows a yearly business as follows:

Chicken feed, one year, 36,500,000, at $500 per million	$18,250 00
Human food, one year, 36,500,000, at 25c. per hundred	6,250 00
Gross amount for year	$24,500 00
Deduct estimated annual expenses of operating the mines, repairs and repainting of clam carts, renewal of tools, etc., etc	62 50
Net profit	$24,437 50

It is believed that few enterprises warrant better prospects for an exceedingly permanent investment. Gentlemen seeking investments are requested to examine the figures.

If they "don't see it," they may dig their own clams.

Any person remitting one dollar to this office, will be entitled to ONE HUNDRED SHARES in the "Hardshell and Hydraulic," including the COMMISSIONAIRE, postpaid for one year.

OLD BACHELORS.—In antiquity it was considered unpatriotic in a citizen to remain a bachelor all his days. By the Spartan laws, those citizens who remained bachelors after middle age were excluded from all offices, civil or military. At certain feasts they were exposed to public derision, and led round the market place. Although, generally speaking, age was deeply respected, yet this feeling was not manifested to old bachelors. "Why should I make way for you," said a Spartan youth to a gray-headed old bachelor, "who will never have a son to do me the same honor when I am old?" The Romans pursued the same policy towards bachelors. They had to pay extra and special taxes, and under Augustus a law was enacted by which bachelors were made incapable of acquiring legacies and devises of real estate by will, except from their near relatives.

IN prosperity, it is the easiest of all things to find a friend; in adversity, it is of all things, the most difficult.

HE is an admirable man who has as much wit as if he had no sense, and as much sense as if he had no wit.

A POEM BY PHŒNIX.

WE are indebted to a friend for the following poem, from the pen of the lamented Phœnix. It has already been published, if we rightly recollect, in Burton's book. Recollections of the author will come to many Californians as they read the quaint lines, which rare John entitle:

A OREGON LAY.

BY A SURVIVING SUFFERER OF THE WAR.

I.

AMONG them that come up to speckilate in stock and supplies
Was a fellow named Stuart, a man of enterprise;
He bought him a switch-tail sorrel, two years old, which had a white face,
And he hantered all Portland, O. T., for a three hundred yard race.

II.

Thar was a man hed a horse, which he thonght her pretty fair;
She was ginerally know'd as "Millard's Thousand dollar mare,"
He hadn't no idea, he said, of doing anything so rash,
But he took up Mister Stuart for two hundred dollars, cash.

III.

So every soul in Portland, O. T., went straight down to the course,
And every cent we horryed we bet on Millard's horse,
And thar was that speckilating Stuart, with his hand upon his hip,
And two men a following with a tinpailfull of dollars and a basketfull of scrip.

III.

Wall! they got measured off the gronnd and the 'orses they got a start,
And come running down right pretty about four foot apart;
And the Millard Mare had it all her own way—so everybody said—
Till, just as they got to the eend of the track, that ar sorrel shot suthin' like ten feet (10) ahead.

V.

Arter that we seen that there riz a most surprisin din,
And remarks like this here followed: "Dog my everlastin' skin,"
"I'll be dod-derned," and "dog-goned," and "ding-blamed, by Pike!"
And thar was such a awful howling, and swearing, and dancing, that many old people said they had never seed the like!!!!

V. ONE EYE.

And that ar speckilating Stuart, he made matters wuss,
He packed the money in a hand cart and didn't care a cuss;
And sweetly smiling pulled it off as though he didn't mind the heft,
And since then we havn't paid no taxes, nor bought nothin, nor sold nothin, for I do suppose that in all Portland, O. T., there aint a single red cent left.

A DROUTH MONODY.—The following very clever little poem in prose, anent the drouth, we take from the columns of that eminently sprightly, lively and loyal newspaper, the San Francisco Morning Call:

A farmer sits gloomy and sad beside his now waterless springs; dreary the prospect around him indeed, and this is the song that he sings: "All our green valleys are brown, all we poor farmers are blue, all our blue grass has turned red in the drouth, all our fields sigh for the dew. All our crops wilt in the sun, all our wet rivers are dry, all our fat cattle are hungry and lean, all our lean cattle will die. All our lands turn into dust, our cereals serious grown, and never a bushel of barley comes back for ten times the quantity sown. Who now shall furnish the grain for market, and 'still of Jim Dows? There's poverty lean in our houses and tales, aye, even the tails of our cows. Of water there's never a drop to moisten the lip or a crust, and even our tears ere they form into pearls, are sponged by the thirst of the dust. Even the clouds are a-dry, scorching the earth with their frown, pumping each vapor from valley and hill, but sending no recompense down. Vapors come in from the sea, but even the fog is aglow and dry as the skin of a fever-hot man when the "Yellow Jack" has him in tow. Even the dew is a myth, that is recreant, too, not even mud for the bills of our ducks, yet all our bills fast coming due. All our wheat turned into chaff, blighted and withered to stubble, never a bubble from fountain or spring, but each hope of harvest a bubble. So thirsty the glittering Sun, he suffers no skin to be wet, there's no perspiration for any through toil, unless through taxation we sweat. Oh, dreadful this siccative earth, so dry—the potato that lies within it would weep, had it moisture enough, hot tears from its pitiful eyes. All over the pitiless plains, the dashaway animals seek for water in vain, for not even a frog could moisten his tongue in a creek. Oh, terrible, terrible wind, oh, pitiless, pitiless sun, relax, and bring hither the clouds from the south, and bid our still rivulets run." Thus, sitting with features forlorn, and knocking his heels on a rail, the sad farmer railed at his luck as he sung or whistled this very dry wail.

THE DEACON AND THE WASPS.—A worthy deacon in a town of Maine was remarkable for the facility with which he quoted Scripture on all occasions. The Divine Word was ever on his tongue's end, and all the trivial as well as the important occurrences of life furnished occasion for quoting the language of the Bible. What was better, however, the exemplary man always made his quotations the standard of action. One hot day he was engaged in mowing, with his hired man, who was leading off, the deacon following in his swath, conning his apt quotations, when the man suddenly sprang from his place, leaving the swath just in time to escape a wasp's nest.

"What is the matter?" hurriedly inquired the deacon.

"Wasp!" was the laconic reply.

"Pooh!" said the deacon, "the wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are bold as a lion!" and, taking the workman's swath he mowed but a step, when a swarm of brisk insects settled about his ears, and he was forced to retreat with many a painful sting, and in great discomfiture.

"Ah!" shouted the other with a chuckle, "the prudent man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself, but the simple pass on and are punished."

The good deacon had found his equal in making applications of the sacred writings, and thereafter was not known to quote Scripture in a mowing field.

CONVERSATION.—Surely one of the best rules in conversation is never to say a thing which any of the company can reasonably wish we had left unsaid; nor can there anything be well more contrary to the ends for which people meet together than to part unsatisfied with each other or themselves.

A Succession of Triumphs.—At each and every Fair held in 1860, Grover & Baker were awarded the highest premiums for their sewing-machines and machiae work. In 1861 the same awards were made them; likewise in 1862; aud tbus far at every State, and numerous District Fairs held in 1863, they have received the highest premiums when exhibited in competitiou with other machiues. Amoug others, in 1863, we are apprised of first premiums at the Oregoa, New York, Vermoat, Iowa, Kentucky, Indinna, Illiaois, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Michigan State Fairs. Certainly no hetter evideuce of the superior merits of the "Grover & Baker" need be adduced than the fact that their "uew style" noiseless machine has invariably taken the palm, and borne off the highest honors in every instance, wben exhibited, since its introdnction iu 1860.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following are a few of the notices which have appeared in our city cotemporaries:

The Californian.—A new candidate for public favor, in the shape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to condnct such a journal with credit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, aud we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

The Californian.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertainiug than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that sbows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the Californian is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertainiug. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and appareutly without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not uecessary to mention the names of those who have become famous hy abusing our language, hut they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest pnblicution known to us. The Californian is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

The Californian.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The Californian impresses us as would a refined, well-hred man of the world. The style is thut of charming repose, easy address and delicuey of perception. There are many original tboughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of tbe paper lies not so much in this as in tbe thoroughly gruceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly jonrnal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reasou to doubt that hy the Californian it is supplied. If its success he equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of hy Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

The Californian.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call. June 19th.

The Californian.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the Californian—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its geueral appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about tbe Californian. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the Californian will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

The New Weekly Review.—The weekly jonrnal we have alreudy announced made its appearance yesterday. The Californian (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after hy those of our compatriots who wish to hecome familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusiag and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the Californian. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, hut simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can he published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the Californian every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

The Californian.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best how on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearauce is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

The Californian.—Tbis new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-hred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely tbe kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with tbe exception of the "heud," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as heing more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numhers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

The Californian.—We have heen favored with a copy of the Californian, a new literary paper, whicb will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over tbe signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice tbat "Inigo" is one of the featnres of the new publication. That the new issue will he a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

The Californian.—This new Saturday newspaper owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, wbo has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

The first number of the Californian, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The Californian contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the couutry.—Monitor, June 4th

The Californian.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long heen felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

California literature has been enriched hy a new weekly puper, the Californian, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known bow to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

The Californian, a new literary jonrnal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He bas also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

Aad the following we clip from the couutry exebanges which have reached us:

The Californian.—Tbe first numher of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of tbis number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectnal resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the Californian acceptahle to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a geatlemau of considerahle journalistic experience, aud a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publicatioa.—Sacramento Daily Union May 30th.

The Californian.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published hy C. H. Webb, a literary gentlemau of considerable ability. It is the best lookiag paper ever printed in tbe State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the ageut for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

The Californian.—This new weekly paper, published in Sau Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been hauded us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly bumorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emen. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

The Californian.—Tbis is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the Californian will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimentul, sickly order of publications, hut one which we hope Californians will he proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

The Californian is the name of a new weekly literary paper which is to make its début in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the husiness affairs of his journal properly, it is sure to succeed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

The Californian.—This is the title of the now literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentlemau of rare scholarly attainments and ripe jndgment in conducting a newspaper. Tbe journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the haadsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the Californian appears to he, and if the publisher will send us his journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

The Californian.—We have received tbe second number of the new hebdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under tbe above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of tbe State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The bigh literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgmeut displayed in its selections, and its neat typograpbical execution, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

The Californian is tbe title of a large and neatly printed weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" tbe first number from our table before we had examined it; tbe second numher, however, is before us, and we find it filled with readiug matter, orginal and selected, of the highest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured that they will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first nnmber of The Californian, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat aad plain in typography, aad gives evidence of tbe hest of editorial taleut.—Placerville Weekly News.

The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. FARRAND'S OSCILLATING
Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.
CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever ; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds : "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which by some injudicious prescription had been converted into an asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

For that is an article calculated to remove rather than to produce asthmatic affections. And as for COUGHS AND COLDS, the world never saw a better remedy, and never will, until nature produces some new ingredient out of which to prepare it. Don't be afraid to use it freely. Every article in it is from nature's own laboratory—the same today as they were a thousand years ago—all calculated to soothe, heal and strengthen. There is no

BETTER FAMILY MEDICINE!

Keep it in the house, use it freely yourself, and give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold. By so doing you may save yourself many days and nights of care, anxiety and watchfulness so inseparably connected with the chamber of the sick. jy2

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, DR. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skillful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be heated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute. Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

FOR GIRLS,

Nos. 64, 66, 68 and 70 SILVER STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

MRS. M. B. SWEDENSTIERNA, PRINCIPAL.

TWELFTH SESSION,

Commencing August 8th, 1864.

THIS INSTITUTION IS DESIGNED TO AFFORD FACILities for the education of girls, fully equal to those furnished at the best Seminaries of the Atlantic States. The course of study is unusually comprehensive, embracing all the branches that the best modern authorities have thought could be advantageously incorporated in the most enlarged scheme of Female Education. In the Collegiate Department it includes the higher mathematics; a course of English Literature and Criticism, taught by a method not elsewhere pursued; Natural History; the Physical Geography of the Pacific Coast; Critical and Universal Grammar; Ecclesiastical History; and the modern applications of Physical Science.

The organization of the School into departments and graded classes, facilitates the pursuit of a regular and systematic course of study. No pupil is permitted to take up the higher branches until thoroughly grounded in the preparatory ones. In the advanced classes, the instruction is to a great extent independent of text-books; and in no case is "going through the book," considered equivalent to "finishing a study."

Calisthenics, consisting of the wand-exercise, etc., take place in the gymnasium daily, from 12 to 12 1-2 o'clock.

Parents, guardians, and others interested in the thorough education of girls, are invited to call and witness for themselves the methods of instruction pursued, the general organization of the school, and its daily workings, which furnish a more reliable test of the excellence of such institutions, than any public examination. No particular "visiting days" have been appointed, the Principal and teachers being gratified by the attendance of visitors, at their daily recitations, at any time and without unusual preparation. Such visits do not in any way interrupt or interfere with the regular routine.

Registers containing full particulars as to the course of study, terms, regulations, etc., can be obtained upon application by mail, or to the Principal personally, at the Seminary. jy16-tf

A MORAL TALE FOR CALIFORNIA CHILDREN.

THE OGRESS OF SILVER LAND;

OR,

THE DIVERTING HISTORY OF PRINCE BADFELLAH AND PRINCE BULLEBOYE.

IN the second year of the reign of the renowned Caliph Lo there dwelt in SILVER LAND, adjoining his territory, a certain terrible ogress. She lived in the bowels of a dismal mountain, where she was in the habit of confining such unfortunate travellers as ventured within her domain. The country for miles around was sterile and barren. In some places it was covered with a white powder, which was called in the language of the country AL KA LI, and was supposed to be the pulverized bones of those who had perished miserably in her service.

In spite of this, every year, great numbers of young men devoted themselves to the service of the ogress, hoping to become her godsons, and to enjoy the good fortune which belonged to that privileged class. For these godsons had no work to perform, neither at the mountain nor elsewhere, but roamed about the world with credentials of their relationship in their pockets, which they called STOKH, which was stamped with the stamp and sealed with the seal of the ogress, and which enabled them at the end of each moon to draw large quantities of gold and silver from her treasury. And the wisest and most favored of those godsons were the Princes BADFELLAH and BULLEBOYE. They knew all the secrets of the ogress, and how to wheedle and coax her. They were also the favorites of SOOPAH INTENDENT, who was her Lord High Chamberlain and Prime Minister, and who dwelt in SILVER LAND.

One day, SOOPAH INTENDENT said to his servants, "What is that which travels the most surely, the most secretly, and the most swiftly?"

And they all answered as one man: "LIGHTNING, my Lord, travels the most surely, the most swiftly and the most secretly!"

Then said SOOPAH INTENDENT, "Let lightning carry this message secretly, swiftly and surely to my beloved friends the Princes BADFELLAH and BULLEBOYE, and tell them that their godmother is dying, and bid them seek some other godmother or sell their STOKH ere it become badjee—worthless."

"Bekhesm! On our heads be it!" answered the servants; and they ran to Lightning with the message, who flew with it to the City by the Sea, and delivered it, even at that moment, into the hands of the Princes BADFELLAH and BULLEBOYE.

Now the Prince BADFELLAH was a wicked young man, and when he had received this message he tore his beard and rent his garment and reviled his godmother, and his friend SOOPAH INTENDENT. But presently he arose, and dressed himself in his finest stuffs, and went forth into the bazaars and among the merchants, capering and dancing as he walked, and crying in a loud voice, "Oh, happy day—oh, day worthy to be marked with a white stone!"

This he said cunningly, thinking the merchants and men of the bazaars would gather about him, which they presently did, and began questioning him: "What news, O most worthy and serene Highness? Tell us, that we may make merry, too!"

Then replied the cunning prince, "Good news, O my brothers, for I have heard this day that my godmother in SILVER LAND is well." The merchants who were not aware of the substance of the real message, envied him greatly, and said one to another: "Surely our brother the Prince BADFELLAH is favored by Allah above all men;" and they were about to retire, when the prince cheeked them, saying: "Tarry for a moment. Here are my credentials or STOKH. The same I will sell you for fifty thousand sequins, for I have to give a feast to-day, and need much gold. Who will give fifty thousand." And he again fell to capering and dancing. But this time the merchants drew a little apart, and some of the oldest and wisest said: "What dirt is this which the prince would have us swallow. If his godmother were well, why should he sell his STOKH. Bismillah! The olives are old and the jar is broken!" When Prince BADFELLAH perceived them whispering, his countenance fell, and his knees smote against each other through fear; but dissembling again, he said: "Well, so be it! Lo, I have much more than shall abide with me, for my days are many and my wants are few. Say forty thousand sequins for my STOKH and let me depart in Allah's name. Who will give forty thousand sequins to become the godson of such a healthy mother?" And he again fell to capering and dancing, but not as gaily as before, for his heart was troubled. The merchants, however, only moved farther away. "Thirty thousand sequins," cried Prince BADFELLAH; but even as he spoke they fled before his face, crying: "His godmother is dead. Lo, the jackals are defiling her grave. Mashalla! he has no godmother." And they sought out PAN IK, the swift-footed messenger, and bade him shout through the bazaars that the godmother of PRINCE BADFELLAH was dead. When he heard this, the prince fell upon his face, and rent his garments, and covered himself with the dust of the market place. As he was sitting thus, a porter passed him with jars of wine on his shoulders, and the prince begged him to give him a jar, for he was exceeding thirsty and faint. But the porter said, "What will my lord give me first?" And the prince in very bitterness of spirit, said, "Take this," and handed him his STOKH, and so exchanged it for a jar of wine.

Now the Prince BULLEBOYE was of a very different disposition. When he received the message of SOOPAH INTENDENT he bowed his head, and said, "It is the will of God." Then he rose, and without speaking a word entered the gates of his palace. But his wife, the peerless MAREE JAHANN, perceiving the gravity of his countenance, said, "Why is my lord cast down and silent? Why are those rare and priceless pearls, his words, shut up so tightly between those gorgeous oyster shells, his lips?" But to this he made no reply. Thinking further to divert him, she brought her lute into the chamber and stood before him, and sung the song and danced the dance of BEN KOTTON which is called IBRAHIM'S DAUGHTER, but she could not lift the veil of sadness from his brow.

When she had ceased, the Prince BULLEBOYE arose and said, "Allah is great, and what am I, his servant, but the dust of the earth! Lo, this day has my godmother sickened unto death, and my STOKH became as a withered palm leaf. Call hither my servants and camel drivers, and the merchants who have furnished me with stuffs, and the beggars that have feasted at my table, and bid them take all that is here, for it is mine no longer!" With these words he buried his face in his mantle and wept aloud.

But MAREE JAHANN, his wife, plucked him by the sleeve: "Prithee, my lord," said she, "bethink thee of the BROKAH or scrivener, who besought thee but yesterday to share thy STOKH with him and gave thee his bond for fifty thousand sequins?" But the noble Prince BULLEBOYE, raising his head, said: "Shall I sell to him for fifty thousand sequins that which I know is not worth a Soo MARKEE. For is not all the BROKAH'S wealth—even his wife and children, pledged on that bond? Shall I ruin him to save myself? Allah forbid! Rather let me eat the salt fish of honest penury, than the kibobs of dishonorable affluence: rather let me wallow in the mire of virtuous oblivion, than repose on the divan of luxurious wickedness."

When the prince had given utterance to this beautiful and edifying sentiment a strain of gentle music was heard, and the rear wall of the apartment which had been ingeniously constructed like a flat, opened and discovered the Ogress of SILVER LAND in the glare of blue fire, seated on a triumphal car attached to two ropes which were connected with the flies, in the very act of blessing the unconscious prince. When the walls closed again without attracting his attention, Prince BULLEBOYE arose and dressed himself in his coarsest and cheapest stuffs, and sprinkled ashes on his head, and in this guise, having embraced his wife, went forth into the bazaars. In this it will be perceived how differently the good Prince BULLEBOYE acted from the wicked Prince BADFELLAH who put on his gayest garments to simulate and deceive.

Now, when Prince BULLEBOYE entered the chief bazaar, where the merchants of the city were gathered in council, he stood up in his accustomed place, and all that were there held their breath, for the noble Prince BULLEBOYE was much respected. "Let the BROKAH, whose bond I hold for fifty thousand sequins, stand forth!" said the prince. And the BROKAH stood forth from among the merchants. Then said the prince: "Here is thy bond for fifty thousand sequins, for which I was to deliver unto thee one-half of my STOKH. Know, then, O my brother—and thou, too, O Aga of the BROKAHS—that this my STOKH which I pledged to thee is worthless. For my godmother, the Ogress of SILVER LAND, is dying. Thus do I release thee from thy bond, and from the poverty which might overtake thee as it has even me, thy brother, the Prince BULLEBOYE." And with that the noble Prince BULLEBOYE tore the bond of the BROKAH into pieces and scattered it to the four winds.

Now when the prince had torn up the bond there was a great commotion, and some said: "Surely the Prince BULLEBOYE is drunken with wine;" and others: "He is possessed of an evil spirit;" and his friends expostulated with him, saying: "What thou hast done is not the custom of the bazaars—behold, it is not BIZ!" But to all the prince answered gravely: "It is right—on my own head be it!"

But the oldest and wisest of the merchants, they who had talked with Prince BADFELLAH the same morning, whispered together, and gathered around the BROKAH whose bond the Prince BULLEBOYE had torn up. "Hark ye," said they, "our brother the Prince BULLEBOYE is cunning as a jackal. What bosh is this about ruining himself to save thee? Such a thing was never heard before in the bazaars. It is a trick, O thou moonealf of a BROKAH! Dost thou not see that he has heard good news from his godmother, the same that was even now told us by the Prince BADFELLAH, his confederate, and that he would destroy thy bond for fifty thousand sequins because his STOKH is worth a hundred thousand! Be not deceived, O too credulous BROKAH! for this what our brother the prince doeth is not in the name of ALLAH, but of BIZ, the only god known in the bazaars of the city."

When the foolish BROKAH heard these things he cried: "Justice, O Aga of the BROKAHS—justice and the fulfillment of my bond! Let the prince deliver unto me the STOKH. Here are my fifty thousand sequins." But the prince said: "Have I not told that my godmother is dying, and that my STOKH is valueless?" At this the BROKAH only clamored the more for justice and the fulfillment of his bond. Then the Aga of the BROKAHS said: "Since the bond is destroyed, behold thou hast no claim. Go thy ways!" But the BROKAH again cried: "Justice, my lord Aga! Behold, I offer the prince seventy thousand sequins for his STOKH!" But the prince said: "It is not worth one sequin!" Then the Aga said: "Bismillah! I cannot understand this. Whether thy godmother be dead, or dying, or immortal, does not seem to signify. Therefore, O prince, by the laws of BIZ and of ALLAH, thou art released. Give the BROKAH thy STOKH for seventy thousand sequins and bid him depart in peace. On his own head be it!" When the prince heard this command, he handed his STOKH to the BROKAH, who counted out to him seventy thousand sequins. But the heart of the virtuous prince did not rejoice, nor did the BROKAH, when he found his STOKH was valueless; but the merchants lifted their hands in wonder at the sagacity and wisdom of the famous Prince BULLEBOYE. For none would believe that it was the law of ALLAH that the prince followed, and not the rules of BIZ.

ON A GIRDLE.

THAT which her slender waist confined
Shall now my joyful temples bind:
No monarch but would give his crown,
His arms might do what this has done.

It was my heaven's extremest sphere,
The pale which held my lovely dear:
My joy, my grief, my hope, my love,
Do all within this circle move.

A narrow compass and yet there
Dwelt all that's good and all that's fair:
Give me but what this riband bound,
Take all the rest the sun goes round.

MARIE; OR THE BLUE HANDKERCHIEF.

TOWARD the close of October, on a fine day which I well remember, though so many years have elapsed, I was returning on foot from Orleans, to the ancient Chateau de Bardy, one of those relics of a former age which have always an interest from former associations. The road wound circuitously among the hills; the sun was shining brightly on the green fields and the little cottages half hidden in their trees; the air, soft and warm, was laden with the rich odor of fruit, and Nature all around me seemed to riot in the luxury of life. Some distance in advance, and on the same road, a regiment of the Garde Etrangere was marching leisurely along, the gay uniforms forming a brilliant contrast with the tranquil air which seemed to spread itself over the country. I pushed quickly on, for I wanted to listen to the music of their band, of which I could only catch a few distant notes; but as I drew nearer the music ceased, and the drum only beat from time to time, to mark the measured step of the soldiers. After half-an-hour I came up with them, and I was surprised and pleased to recognize in one of the officers a friend whom I had known in Paris. We saluted each other, and walked on together in conversation, when the regiment suddenly wheeled off the road and halted on a little common beside it, surrounded with fir-trees.

"You are about to manœuvre, I suppose?"

"No," said the captain, with a shrug of the shoulders, "we have a bad job here. They are about to try, and shoot, probably, a soldier of my company, for having robbed the peasant he was billeted on."

"What! judge him and condemn him and execute him, all in the same moment?"

"'Tis according to the articles," answered he.

The word, in his sense, was unanswerable; as if in these articles everything had been provided for—crime and chastisement, justice and humanity itself.

"Come," said the captain, "follow me, if you have any curiosity; it will soon be over."

Instinctively I followed him, for I was desirous of seeing the end of this strange drama.

The regiment was formed in a square: behind the second line, and at the edge of the wood, a few soldiers were digging a grave. A cold chill ran through me as I saw it. But still it was quite possible that the culprit might be declared innocent, and I consoled myself with the reflection.

In the centre of the square, eight officers were sitting upon drums, and a ninth, to the right of them and a little in advance, wrote from time to time a few words on a sheet of paper, which was spread out on his knees; but he seemed to do it negligently and as a mere matter of form.

The prisoner was summoned. He was a young man of fine appearance, and with a frank open look, which was in itself a recommendation; and with him a woman advanced, who was the only witness in the matter.

The colonel turned toward her, and was about to interrogate her, when the soldier stepped forward.

"'Tis useless," said he; I confess everything; it is I who have stolen the handkerchief of this woman."

"You, Titer," said the colouel, "you have always passed for and honest fellow."

"'Tis true, colonel, I have always tried to please my officers. 'Tis not for myself I stole it; 'tis for Marie."

"For what Marie?"

"For Marie who lives yonder, in the country; 'tis by Areneberg, by the great tree that— Shall I never see her again?"

"Explain yourself, Titer. I cannot comprehend you."

"My colonel, read, I pray, this letter." And he handed him the following letter, every word of which is living in my memory:

"TITER, DEAR FRIEND.—I avail myself of Arnold, the recruit, who is engaged in thy regiment, to send to thee this letter and a silk purse which I have made after thy wish. I hid myself from my father to make it; for he scolds me always for loving thee so much, and tells me thou wilt never come back. But thou wilt come back, Titer? Even if thou dost not, I shall still love thee. Did I not promise thee, on the day when thou broughtest me my blue kerchief at the dance at Areneberg? When shall I again see thee? It gives me pleasure to hear thou art esteemed by thy officers, loved by thy comrades. But thou hast still two years. Pass them quickly, and then we will marry at the last. Adieu, Titer, dear friend. "THY DEAR MARIE.

"P. S.—Try to send me something from France; not for fear that I forget thee, but that I may carry it with me. But thou must kiss what thou sendest, for I am sure I shall find at once the place of thy kiss."

When the letter had been read Titer again spoke. "Arnold," said he, "brought me that letter last night, when I received my billet. All night I had no sleep; for I was thinking of my country and of Marie. She had asked of me something from France; but I had no money, for I have engaged my pay for three months to set free my brother and cousin, who are returned to their country now a few days past. This morning I got up to leave, and I opened my window. A blue kerchief was hanging on a cord. It was like Marie's; it had the same color, the same white lines in it. I had the weakness to take it. I placed it in my haversack, and I descended to the street; but I repented, and I was returning to the house when the woman ran after me. The handkerchief was found on me. I have told the truth. The articles say I am to be shot. Shoot me, then, but do not despise me."

The judges could not hide their emotion. Who could. But when it was put to the vote he was condemned to death unanimously. He listened to the sentence with calmness, and then, approaching the captain, he prayed of him that he would lend him four francs. The captain handed them to him.

And then I saw him turn to the woman, to whom the handkerchief had been restored, and I heard these words:

"Here, Madame, are four francs; I know not if the handkerchief be worth more; but if it be, I am giving my life for it as well. I pray, you, then, to let me take it."

The poor woman, trembling and horrified, let it drop from her hand, and Titer, taking it from the ground, walked back to the officer.

"My officer," said he, in a tone that it was suffocating to hear, and that brought tears into all eyes, "in two years you will return to our mountains; you will again see them. Ask for Marie, then, at Areneberg; all the village knows Marie—she is so good. My officer, give her this handkerchief from poor Titer; but ah! do not say at what price he bought it. You promise?"

"I promise," replied the other, the tears rolling down his swarthy cheeks.

And then Titer knelt down and began to recommend his soul to God. As for me, I could no longer bear this horrible spectacle—this martyrdom of an innocent whom Nature herself absolved. I crawled away, sick with horror, my limbs trembling under me, and a weight hanging heavily on my heart, and threw myself into the wood, that I might not see the cruel tragedy about to happen.

"Just Heaven!" I cried, as I leaned almost in weakness against the trunk of a tree; "of what impieties is not man guilty! Not even for an hour can he be good and kind. Tigers are more merciful. We are to each other wolves or divinities. God pardon this hapless one—"

The echo of the muskets rang through the wood; the very leaves seemed to tremble as it rolled from tree to tree. I fell upon my knees; I wept aloud.

By-and-by, when all was quiet, I stole out of the wood. They had all gone? All? Alas! I turned again to the road, and I shuddered to see, at a little distance, the short grass crimsoned with ghastly stains; close by was a mound of new-dug earth. I broke down a branch from one of the trees, and fashioned it into a rude cross; and I planted it on the unknown grave where poor Titer lies, forgotten by all the world save by me and perhaps by Marie.

HABITS OF THE ROMAN LADIES.

THE ladies of ancient Rome rose early, and immediately enjoyed the luxury of the bath, which was sometimes perfumed water; they then underwent the process of polishing with pumice-stone for the purpose of smoothing the skin, and after being anointed with rich perfumes, they threw around them a loose robe and retired to their dressing-rooms, where they received morning visits from their friends, and discussed the merits of the last eloquent speech delivered in the Senate, or the probable conqueror in the next gladiatorial combat. After the departure of their visitors commenced the business of the toilet, which occupied a considerable portion of time; the maids were summoned, to each of whom a different duty was assigned; some formed a kind of council, and only looked on to direct and assist the others by their advice and experience; one held the mirror before her mistress, while others there were to whom it was a —— constant care

The bodkin, comb, and essence to prepare,

With the exception of the looking-glass, the articles of the toilet were much the same as those in use at present. The glass, or more properly speaking, mirror, was composed of a highly-polished plate of metal, generally silver, richly chased around the edges, and adorned with precious stones; this was not fixed in a frame like the modern glass, but held by a slave. The combs were formed of ivory and rosewood. Curling-tongs, bodkins and hair-pins were also known; the former was a simple bar of iron heated in the fire, around which the hair was turned in order to produce a curl; the two latter were made of gold and silver, and ornamented with pearls; it was probably with one of these bodkins that Cleopatra gave herself a death-wound, and not, as is commonly supposed, with an adder.

The use of perfumes, cosmetics and depilatories prevailed to a great extent among the Romans; the first were obtained at a considerable expense from India, Greece and Persia; there are still in existence a few recipes for making the cosmetics made two thousand years ago, and which will be found to have many ingredients in common with similar preparations of our own time. Ovid gives the following, and adds that those who use it will possess a complexion smoother than the surface of their polished mirrors: "Take two pounds of Lybian barley, free from straw and chaff, and an equal quantity of the pea of the wild vetch, mix these with ten eggs, let it harden, and pound it, add two ounces of hartshorn, and a dozen roots of the narcissus bruised in a mortar, two ounces of gum, and two ounces of meal; reduce the whole to a powder, sift it, and add nine times the quantity of honey." Some used poppy juice and water, and others a pap or poultice of bread and milk, with which they completely covered the face, and kept on in their own houses; this, when removed, left the skin smooth and fair. Depilatories were used to form and adorn the eyebrows, which it was considered elegant to have joined across the nose.

On one part of a Roman lady's dressing-table might be seen her small silver tooth-brush, which, with the assistance of a little pure water and occasionally a powder of mastic wood, formed her only dentifrice; near it stood a paper containing a black powder, which, when ignited, sent up a volume of thick smoke, and had the valuable property of restoring the eyes to their former brilliancy, if weakened by the gayety of the preceding evening or a sleepless night occasioned by the constant serenades of her lover beneath her window. Here was a bottle of the perfume of Pæsium, and there a box of rouge, and another of hair-dye; on another part lay a large coil or braid of false hair, made up by a male hair-dresser, and near it were the bodkins, the chains, the rings, and hard by the richly studded bands of white and purple which adorned the head; this braid was worn on the crown of the head, the hair from the nape of the neck being all pulled out by the roots. Continual changes were taking place in the fashion of wearing the hair; at first it was cut off as a votive offering to the gods, but the Roman ladies soon discovered that "a luxuriant head of hair was a powerful auxiliary of female beauty," and allowed it to grow; at one time it was worn high in bows with a range of curls in front; at another a la grecque; then allowed to float in the air in a disheveled state, and again a la militaire, in the form of a helmet. Light hair was generally worn over that of a naturally dark shade, auburn being the color most esteemed and admired by both sexes; those who had white or dark hair used saffron as a dye to give it an auburn tinge. Some ladies used gold dust as a hair powder, "which shed such a ray of glory round them as dazzled all beholders, and gave their heads an appearance of being on fire." When the ladies did not "wear the hair," they wore a kind of a veil and a turban or bonnet called mitra; this was like a bishop's mitre in shape but not so high, and with a lappet hanging over each cheek, something in fact like a modern mob-cap, which elegant head-dress owes its origin, no doubt, to the classical mitre; thus has the Roman female head-dress descended to our times, not only as one of the members of the right reverend bench, but also in the shape of a covering for the domestic matrons.

After having performed their ablutions, and gone through all the little delicate offices of making the complexion, perfuming the person, and endeavoring by art to excel nature, the Roman ladies were prepared to put on their costly garments, which were duly produced by the slave who had the honorable post of "mistress of the robes." In the earlier ages the under-garment—which in other respects differed little from the modern—was worn as high as the chin and down to the feet, so as to leave no part of the person visible except the face; in time, however, it was cut lower and shortened: over this was worn the tunica, a dress composed of many folds, open at the sides and with sleeves; these sleeves were left open from the shoulder to the wrist, and fastened with clasps of gold and silver; one end of the tunica was fixed to the left shoulder, while the other was carried across the breast and fell negligently over the right shoulder till it touched the ground; this train was generally carried over the arm when walking, so as to show the right ankle; but it was considered negligé and graceful to allow it to drag on the ground instead of holding it up, and consequently was a custom much in vogue among the distingués of ancient Rome. This was the dress worn during the republic, but it is difficult to obtain a correct description of it from the very vague accounts handed down to us; probably, as in most republics, little attention was paid to dress—at all events it was plain and simple. It was not until the time of the emperors that the goddess of Fashion reared her head in the capital of the world, when, though considerable alterations took place in dress, yet a few traits of the former style were retained. The number of garments worn varied according to the temperature of the wearer; they were generally three; the first was the simple vest; the second a kind of petticoat richly worked in front and surrounded at the waist by a belt, which answered the purpose of a corset and was formed in front like a stomacher, richly studded with jewels; then came the third garment, the stola, which entirely superceded the use of the ancient tunica; this was a robe with a small train, trimmed at the bottom with a deep border of purple and gold; it was confined at the waist by a belt, and the upper part thrown back so as to discover the embroidered front of the second garment or petticoat; on this front was worn the laticlave, an order or decoration of the empire granted to distinguished men, and sometimes assumed by females in right of their husbands. Over all these was worn the pallia or cloak, with a train of some yards in length, which fell from the shoulders, where it was fastened by two richly-ornamented fibulæ or clasps: this train was trimmed with gold and silver, and sometimes with precious stones, and was usually carried over the left shoulder in the manner of the ample roquelaure worn by gentlemen. It will be seen from the above description that there is a considerable resemblance between the ancient Roman dress and the modern court dress, the former perhaps exceeding the latter in gracefulness and elegance of appearance, from its numerous folds and flowing outline. The materials of which these dresses were composed were silk, cashmere and linen. Embroidery was procured from the Phœnicians and Assyrians; the former was most esteemed as it was raised, while the latter was smooth with the surface of the cloth. The only color used for robes was white trimmed with purple, colored clothes not being considered comme il faut among the higher orders at Rome.

The Roman stocking was of silk, generally pink or flesh-colored, over which was worn a shoe, or rather boot, reaching above the ankle, turned up at the point like a Chinese shoe, and laced up from the instep tight to the leg. This boot was made of white leather or the papyrus bark, ornamented with gold, silver and jewels. Sandals were also in use; they consisted of a simple sole with ribbon attached to it, and was laced up like a modern sandal, at the same time supplying the place of a garter by keeping the stocking up. We are informed that coquettes used cork-soles and false insteps of cork, but never disfigured their persons by the barbarian ornaments of necklace, ring, or ear-ring.

After the Roman lady had completed her toilet she sallied out, followed by a slave, for a promenade beneath the porticoes of the Forum, where she could not only cheapen goods, but also hear what was going on in the law courts. After continuing her walk up the gentle ascent of the gay and crowded Suburra street, she returned to her own house, the threshold of which (if she happened to be unmarried) was adorned with garlands of flowers, placed there by her young patrician admirers; some of these flowers her attendants collected to fill the splendid vase which stood in her chamber, and preceded her to draw aside the curtain which supplied the place of a door into the tapestried and perfumed apartment; here she enters, and sinking softly down into an ivory and gold-adorned chair, she is welcomed by the chirping notes of her favorite bird which hangs near in a gilded cage. By her side stands a beautiful page, who gently wafts a plume of peacocks' feathers around her head, while a slave presents a small stick wrapped around with, apparently, a roll of straw-colored ribbon, but in reality it is a letter from the young Emilius, who adopts this mode of writing in preference to the usual waxen tablet, not only because it is a fashion introduced from Greece, but because it preserves most inviolably those secrets which are only meant to meet the eye of his lovely mistress; far be it from us to pry into these secrets, so let us now bid adieu to the lair Lucretia, who begins anxiously to unroll the folds of her papyrean epistle.

MY SERVICE OF PLATE.

NOT long ago I was presented by a circle of admiring friends with a service of plate.

I use the term admiring in a figurative sense, mind; not that I am incapable of exciting admiration in the opposite sex, but because this particular circle of friends was composed entirely of men, with the weaknesses of men, including envy, jealousy, etc., and because I have been made painfully aware since that some of them entertained feelings toward me bordering on dislike, which necessarily precludes all sentiments of admiration.

I am what angry tax-payers call a public servant; an upper servant, however, being at the head of one of the bureaus in a certain department of the Federal Government.

It is customary every year in this department for one of the chief clerks to receive, and the underlings to present, a testimonial, in the shape, generally, of a silver service, procured by voluntary subscriptions from all the employés. As these presentations are confined to the chief clerks, a few, in fact, many, of the underlings, with the pettiness inherent in our fallen natures, are mean enough to regard these voluntary subscriptions in the light of forced contributions, and to class them with the monthly levy on our salaries for party purposes, which really is odious and tyrannical, but to which we are compelled to submit by the uncertain tenure of political positions.

Last year, it was Van Ricketts the First Auditor's turn to receive; the year before Sweetser the Cashier accepted; this year Palafox Primrose, your most obedient, was honored with, as I premised, a service of plate.

Yes, honored! to my great regret and misfortune, as I will shortly make apparent.

The gift is invariably made on a Christmas-eve; and it is etiquette for the designated recipient, although aware of the intended honor months before, to affect profound ignorance of what is going to take place; to be blind to the subscription-list passing under his nose; and moreover, to be unusually bland and amiable to all in the office; this last circumstance exposing him to the designs of any unscrupulous employé who may take advantage of the complacent mood of his superior to "hedge" the amount of his subscription by borrowing. This happened to me, who, although not a lending man, was obliged—yes obliged—to give (for it were mockery to call it lending) sundry sums, amounting in the aggregate to eighty-two dollars, the week preceding my reception of the plate. Of course, it is impossible to refuse; the meanest miser alive couldn't be guilty of that at a moment when his fellow-citizens are bestirring themselves to offer him a proof of their love and esteem in an elegant, costly and substantial shape. Of course a man feels flattered—highly so—and can't help telling his wife all about it beforehand, as I did, rather incautiously, as it chanced; for she naturally confided the important information to other ladies who in turn confided it to their husbands; so that, in the confusion of tenses incidental to the verbal transmission, it was spread abroad and believed that I actually was in possession of the testimonial a week before the presentation much to my annoyance, as I was obliged to receive congratulations with counterfeit looks of blank surprise, and practice the most unblushing deception and insincerity. However, it was impossible to find fault with Emma (that is Mrs. Primrose) for her indiscreet and premature revelations; for the dear woman was as highly flattered at the forth coming honor as I was—certainly more demonstratively delighted, for she set about immediately making preparations for the event. She mentioned at once the necessity of receiving the committee appointed to wait upon me in a proper manner, and suggested that the drawing-rooms needed new curtains and a new carpet, hinting also at the propriety of our two daughters having new apparel, to say nothing, which she did say, about her own attire.

I ventured a mild objection. "My dear Emma," said I, "why not receive our friends at our plain and happy fireside without ostentation? Why should we depart from that republican simplicity which has ever been our ornament and pride, and which we have inherited, with other virtues, from our Revolutionary forefathers?"

"My dear Palafox," replied my wife, banishing my objections with a kiss, "this is no ordinary occasion. I have always had a profound contempt for testimonals in general; and were this one of those silly, unmeaning ceremonies, arising from vanity and mutual admiration, I would not stir a hand or foot to receive them; but this is altogether different. I know it to be but the genuine and spontaneous expression of esteem from those who know you best, and have had the amplest opportunity to judge you, and recognize your worth and ability."

"Well, well, Emma," said I, with a smile, "perhaps it is so. Do as you like, my love." And I decided from that moment that Mrs. Primrose took the right view of the matter; for she is a woman of uncommon keen perception, and an excellent judge of human nature.

My house is a small and modest one; but on the auspicious occasion I may say it presented quite a brilliant appearance. The new carpet was resplendent; Mrs. Primrose and our daughters Emma and Susan were effulgent; and I was attired with my usual good taste in a new suit of clothes and a scintillating scarf.

The committee came toward evening, preceded by a porter, who deposited, or rather dropped, a heavy package wrapped in brown paper on the centre-table of our front drawing-room. My family and I affected total unconcern at this proceeding, as in duty bound, and awaited the action of the committee, whom we rose to meet with cordial yet serious and becoming greetings.

The spokesman, my intimate friend Swectser, the most effective stump-speaker in the Thirtieth Ward, now addressed me in a speech of uncommon power, and which my modesty forbids me to repeat at length. Suffice it to say that he alluded in very complimentary terms to my long career of usefulness as an officer of the United States Government; to my unswerving fidelity, unshaken loyalty, and unimpeachable integrity while in the service of said Government; touching also on the enviable reputation I enjoyed as a fellow citizen, a husband, a father and an accountant. Then, with a graceful wave of his hand, the orator directed my attention to the service, now free from its envelopes and shining in splendor, in the following words: "The nation, sir, owes you a debt of gratitude which it is unable to pay; but we, sir, as an integral portion of that nation, and as representatives of your fellow-citizens in the employ of the —— Department of the United States of America, beg to tender you, sir, this service of plate as a trifling token of our esteem and regard for your manifold virtues, talents, and worth."

This glowing eulogium overwhelmed me. My heart swelled, my eyes filled, and my tongue clave to the roof of my mouth. I could only shake the hand of Sweetser and the rest of the committee with silent emotion and felt supremely happy, and that I deserved it all.

My wife and the girls were equally overcome, but soon recovered sufficient composure to wipe their eyes and order Bridget to throw aside the sliding doors of the back-parlor where a sumptuous banquet awaited the attention and appetite of our friends. I could only wave them toward the table, and with commendable alacrity they devoted themselves, without useless ceremony, to the choice Champagne, Bourbon, and brandy I had with generous forethought provided for their delectation.

I can say with truth that that was the proudest moment of my life. I felt now that my abilities had at last met with due appreciation, and, in fact, and in my mind's eye, I saw my way clear to at least a seat in Congress.

The committee did justice to our hospitality, and it was very late, or rather early, when they left. Three of them, owing to the festivities falling into their knee-joints, were unable to walk home, and had to be conveyed in the bottom of a baker's cart, (the only vehicle procurable at that hour,) but these were enthusiasts who threw their whole soul into every undertaking.

We slept but little, if any, the remainder of that night. It took at least two hours after our guests had departed to thoroughly examine the gift and review the ceremony and entertainment. "I must say, my dear, that the whole affair is highly creditable indeed to all concerned," remarked I to Mrs. P. "Very, very creditable."

"Yes, love," replied my wife, with her eyes still on the silver; "it is so gratifying also to find that one has so many warm and devoted friends."

"It is indeed. It would be gratifying to any one's feelings. It is to mine," I acknowledged with proud consciousness and with a glow of satisfaction still on my countenance as I stood warming my back at the fire.

"And what an heir-loom this will be, Palafox! Just think! your great-grandchildren will cherish each piece, and point with pride to the inscription: 'Presented to Palafox Primrose, Esq., Christmas, 1863, by the—'"

"Is Mr. Spinneymush, that little fellow with the heavy moustache, married?" interrupted my daughter Susan.

This introduced a new train of ideas; and with a yawn, I suggested the propriety of retiring for the remainder of the night.

"Let us put the silver away before we go. But where shall we put it? It won't be safe to leave it here," said Mrs. P.

"True, Emma; true. I think that, for this night, we had better each take a piece to bed with us. That will be the safest plan."

And so Mrs. Primrose and I hid the salver between the mattresses of our bed, and the teapot under the bolster, while the girls took charge of the cream-jug and sugar-bowl. The tea-pot—or, rather, the possession of it—made a wakeful pillow, for my thoughts would revert to certain ideas engendered by Mrs. Primrose's last remark, and which excited apprehensions of a rather unpleasant nature. The morning brought but little reassurance. I am not a rash man; but, on the contrary, rather a cautious one—in fact, a nervously cautious one. My dwelling is a detached one, on the outskirts of the city, and near an unquiet and disorderly neighborhood; hence I was justified I think in feeling for the safety of my family while in possession of such a tempting bait for burglars.

I went to business, and received the congratulations of the clerks with my elation much subdued, especially as I noted that some of them appeared rather dissatisfied, and as if they looked upon me in the light of an extortioner. If so, they little thought how they were being avenged.

I took home with me that evening an abundance of bolts, long and strong, and a six-shooter. Mrs. Primrose turned a little pale at the sight of the weapon and my determined aspect, but said nothing. She awoke me, however, several times during the night to listen, so that I passed a somewhat restless one.

"My dear, why not buy a safe—a burglar proof one?" suggested Mrs. P.; "then we might sleep in perfect security."

I merely answered that a burglar-proof safe was an expensive expedient, costing probably as much as the service was worth; and hinted that I had already laid out as much money in honor of the testimonial as I could afford.

The following evening, Bridget, our faithful handmaiden, brought the unwelcome intelligence that the fact of our possessing the testimonial was known in the disorderly neighborhood; that children had been hanging on our palings all the afternoon to catch a glimpse of it; and that she had heard it talked about in the grocery between several men of indigent appearance.

"D—n the service!" I exclaimed; "I wish it were further!"

"Hush-sh-sh!" said my gentle helpmeet, reproving the hasty objurgation. "Palafox, that's rather ungenerous to our kind friends. It may be somewhat annoying for the present, but think of the pride of your great grandchildren."

I was on the point of anathematizing those unborn innocents, when fortunately Mrs. Primrose stopped my mouth with her little hand and prevented me.

"I tell you what we can do, dear. We can get a Patent Magnetic Alarm Telegraph, that I see advertised, and have the wires affixed to every door and window, and in case any one attempted to enter, bells would be set a-ringing that would arouse the whole household."

"A very good idea indeed, Emma; I'll order one to-morrow. Meanwhile I step down to the station-house and have a talk with the police on the subject."

As a prudent man I deemed it my duty to notify the authorities of the suspicious excitement prevalent in the disorderly neighborhood on the subject of my testimonial.

"I am glad you mentioned it," said the sergeant on duty, "for there's a 'lush drum' in the avenue near you, much frequented by 'crossmen,' 'knucks,' and 'koniackers,' and you had better keep a sharp look to your locks. I'll direct the men to keep an eye on your premises, however, and we'll put 'em 'dead to rights' if thing is attempted."

At my request, the gentlemanly officer explained that "lush drum" meant a low dram-shop patronized by thieves; that "crossmen" were house-breakers; "knucks" pickpockets; and "koniackers" passers of counterfeit money.

This was explicit if not reassuring; and when I went home I followed the officer's advice, and kept a very sharp look to my locks. It was too bitterly cold that night, to delude one's self into the belief that the vigilant police had the promised eye on my premises, and I had a horrid dream that a detachment of crossmen and koniackers from the lush drum, armed with bludgeons and daggers, had feloniously invaded our bed-chamber.

The next night we had the protection of the Patent Magnetic Alarm Telegraph; but Bridget, who had sat up rather late with a cousin "from the wars," thought she heard a noise in the back-yard, and, forgetting the alarm telegraph, threw up the dining-room window without detatching the wire. Instantly a frightful tintinuabulation resounded throughout the house, and Mrs. Primrose and the girls were thrown into convulsions of terror. Alarmed at the condition of my poor spouse, I dared not leave her to ascertain what had happened; and for a few minutes that seemed hours, we suffered indescribable fears, when Bridget arrived to explain the mishap and relieve our apprehensions.

"Emma," said I at breakfast the next morning, "that service is undoubtedly a flattering testimonial, but it is also a nuisance. I would like," I added faintly, "to—to—sell it."

"Palafox, surely you are not in earnest," said Mrs. P., gravely; "for my part I would rather undergo untold torments than part with it in any way."

"Well, Mrs. Primrose," said I, in a determined tone, "I suppose we must keep it here until after New-Year's Day, for the whole department promises to visit us on that day, and the silver must be on exhibition; but after that I will not consent to keep it any longer, and subject you and the girls to such constant frights."

A new expedient suggested itself to Mrs. P. "Why not keep it in some bank? Have a neat mahogany case lined with velvet, made to contain it, and keep it in some bank where we can have it at a moment's notice."

"An excellent idea, my dear; I never thought of it. I'll order the case at once."

Meanwhile New-Year's Day came, and with it a host of clerks from the department, who brought their friends, and all admired the service, and all preferred quenching their thirst in champagne than in tea or coffee. And some did so, I regret to say, with an avidity that betrayed their intention of getting the worth of their subscription in wine.

The mahogany case was finished, and I called on the cashier of the bank where I keep my little account and stated my wishes.

"My dear sir, we would oblige you with pleasure, but I wouldn't advise you to leave it here. The bank could not assume the least responsibility of such a deposit; and this being something that you prize far beyond its intrinsic value, why, if it were lost or stolen—"

"Oh," said I, rather eagerly, "I would not expect you to assume the slightest responsibility. I should be perfectly satisfied even if it were lost, knowing that I had left it at my own risk."

There was sincerity in my tones, but the cashier was evidently bent on refusing me.

"Um!" he replied. "Well; but the difficulty is, we have no room to spare for it. It is altogether too cumbersome. I would oblige you otherwise; but in this case the case is the objection—ha, ha! Do you take?"

I left him in despair, but calm despair, with my mind fully made up to fling the confounded testimonial into the river ere I would pass another night of such tribulation as I had undergone.

Fortunately, on my way to consummate my intention of consigning the silver to the locker of David Jones, a symbol met my gloomy gaze that bade me hope and be of good cheer—an insignia that betokened the habitation of one devoted to relieving the necessities of the distressed; of a philanthropist full of the milk of human kindness and of money—a responsible man who invited my confidence, and to whom, in a short interview, I imparted my desire. He promised instant relief, and in the most generous manner offered not only to take charge of the testimonial, but also to lend me a handsome sum of money for the privilege of being custodian.

I went home with a light heart. The next day my friend was in possession of the silver. He has it now. He gave me his bond to return it at any time I might want it; and although I would have preferred being under no obligation to him, yet he insisted so strongly on it that, rather than hurt his feelings, I accepted a little loan, which my great-grandchildren, if they wish to point with pride to the inscription, may pay with, of course, interest.

And now, in conclusion, I will state, for the benefit of any who may be now or hereafter afflicted with a testimonial, that my benefactor's name is Mr. Aaron Abednego, the pawnbroker.

CUPID KISSED ME.

LOVE and I, one summer-day,
Took a walk together:
Oh, how beautiful the way
Through the blooming heather!
Far-off bells rang matin-chimes,
Birds sang, silver-voicing;
And our happy hearts beat time
To the earth's rejoicing.
Well-a-day! ah, well-a-day!
Then pale Grief had missed me,
And Mirth and I kept company,
Ere Cupid kissed me.

Love ran idly where he would,
Child-like, all unheeding;
I as carelessly pursued
The pathway he was leading.
Till upon the shadowed side
Of a cool, swift river,
Where the sunbeams smote the tide,
Goldenly aquiver:
Well-a-day! ah, well-a-day!
"Love," I cried, "come, rest thee."
Ah, but Heart and I were gay,
Ere Cupid kissed me!

Shadows of the summer-cloud
Fell on near and far-land,
Fragrantly the branches bowed
Every leafy garland;
While, with shining head at rest,
Next my heart reclining,
Love's white arms, with soft caress,
Round my neck were twining;
Till—ah, well! ah, well-a-day!
Love, who can resist thee?—
On the river-banks that day,
Cupid kissed me.

Woe is me! in cheerless plight,
By the cold, sad river,
Seek I Love, who, taken flight,
Comes no more forever—
Love, from whom more pain than bliss
Every heart obtaineth;
For the joy soon vanishes,
While the pang remaineth.
Well-a-day! ah, well-a-day!
Would, Love, I had missed thee!
Peace and I are twain for aye,
Since Cupid kissed me!

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XX.

FROM not having received anything from me for some days, my dear William, perhaps you will accuse me of forgetfulness or of laziness. I am guilty of neither. But my patient, Dr. Schultz, occupies much of my time. We have arguments as of old, but with all these details I will not weary you—the more especially as the publisher of the CALIFORNIAN intends to republish my memoirs, translated; and details and metaphysics might bore the readers of that excellent journal. I resume my narrative. . . .

My last letter left us at the close of that eventful day. Diana had divined the state of my soul. I saw her so sad one morning when she questioned my countenance, that I was ashamed of my weakness. I do not know what voice of the air cried to me that I fled before a shadow. I resolved, even if I perished, to combat one by one the weaknesses under which I had until then bowed.

I put myself face to face with the phantom of my fear in reading over the papers of my trial. I astonished myself at my calmness, and to accustom myself to discussion I wrote a long letter to Granger, in which I recounted with the minuteness of a lawyer all the sad points of this great trial. I was satisfied with myself; however, it was necessary for me to go to the village to entrust Bastien with the letter. At the moment of setting out, a sad omen retarded my steps. At the thought that I must again encounter the women washing at the fountain, a cloud came before my eyes. I thought of making a detour to avoid them. But I had sworn not to yield to my weakness, and followed my route.

As I left the chateau I perceived the ragged little rascal who was playing the spy on me for the benefit of my guardian; but I had gained a self-victory too great to permit me to be affected by this incident, and I did not turn back. Arrived at the fountain I met without flinching the looks fixed upon me, and I laughed at my foolish terrors of old. I boldly crossed the great street, the people saluting me as I passed. I again met the curate, and stopped to chat with him. Nothing in his conversation betrayed any suspicion. Evidently he did not believe me to be crazy. Confidence returned to me; I understood that closeted in my sombre thoughts I had, without knowing it, conjured up phantoms which it was only necessary to touch with the finger to have them disappear. One blow and the defamations of Placide were put to rest, and the unworthy plot against me would be turned to the confusion of my enemies.

But even at the moment when I believed myself saved I was on the borders of an abyss. I had charged Ba[illegible]n with my message and I came back, happy at having final[illegible]ken off the yoke of fear, when crossing the square in fron[illegible] church, I found myself followed by a crowd of childr[illegible] the midst of whom Lazarus was gesticulating—that worthless scape-grace pledged to Placide, whom I had left near the chateau. Annoyed by their smiles I stopped; they also stopped. Irritated, I pretended to chase them; some of them ran, but Lazarus set himself up to plague me, and two or three of the boldest imitated him, grimacing around me and crying "Oho! Mr. Simpleton, will you dance?"

At the noise, the inhabitants made their appearance on their thresholds; in a moment I became the point of attraction for all eyes. At seeing myself the plaything of these unpitying children, I became enraged and rushed in pursuit of Lazarus, whose audacity plainly indicated him as the instigator of this attack, when suddenly, at the other side of the square, I perceived Placide, who was watching me with a cunning laugh. My mind caught it all at a glance. I saw that it was he who had arranged this disaster. My rage turned against him: I rushed towards him; he fled, and I followed him around the square in the midst of the clamors which dismayed me. I was on the point of catching him, when he took refuge in a shop and fastened himself in. I dashed against the door in such fury that the window-panes flew in pieces. Some cried out that the rogue had gained the fields by another door. I stopped: although blinded with rage, I had still enough coolness to comprehend the absurdity and odium of this scene. The peasants surrounded me, commenting loudly on the affair.

"This poor man, however, is not wicked," said one of them; "why torment him?"

"I say he is not simple," exclaimed another; "you see he makes no grimaces."

"His dead mother was very kind all the same."

"Pardieu!" said the miller, "it is something gotten up by that beggar Placide; he wished to avenge the blows he received."

Tears of rage rushed to my eyes. I inspired pity. I fled. On leaving the village I entered the woods. They have succeeded, thought I; to-morrow I shall be mad! I tried in vain to regain my fast-dying energy. But I reason—I think, said I to myself. My brain is healthy; I comprehend fully the infamy which is meditated against me. I recognize these trees, these paths so often trodden. Memories of the past rose up in crowds before me clear and brilliant as ever.

A spring trickled through the underwood: I ran towards it and leaned over the basin to see my face; it was so pale that it frightened me. "Ah, if Diana sees me thus, it will cause her pain," exclaimed I; and I dared not return to the chateau. I know not how many hours I wandered around this spot. I returned every moment to see again my face in the spring; it was always pale. I tried to persuade myself that I was the victim of an illusion. Would I have thought of the sorrow of Diana if I had not my reason? Otherwise, the water was limpid; and every object—the sky, my clothes—were reflected perfectly.

I could not doubt it; and stupefied and fascinated I contemplated this strange, immovable image, those haggard eyes fixed on mine. A horrible fear oppressed me; I recalled to my mind the German legend of the man who lost his shadow, and I asked myself if I had not changed forever my living aspect for the lividity of a corpse. The vine-dressers passed by. I hid myself so as not to terrify them.

Nevertheless, such a long absence could not but have given Diana the greatest anxiety. Night coming on, I returned to the chateau, climbing the wall of the park and creeping stealthily into my apartment. There I found myself face to face with Fritz, who was awaiting me.

"The second bell has already sounded for dinner," said he to me. "Will M. André dress now?"

"No; go and tell my godmother that I am a little fatigued, and I beg her to excuse me."

He started to go out; I recalled him.

"Fritz," said I to him, "do you think there is anything strange about me this evening?"

"Nothing, sir," replied he; "without it is that your jacket is torn in two places. You must have torn it on the thorns."

As soon as he left the room my first impulse was to run to the mirror. That fearful lividness appeared still more intense by the light of a lamp. A cold perspiration stood on my forehead. I could no longer doubt I was the plaything of a hallucination; madness would soon overpower me.

Fritz returned, bringing my dinner.

"The Countess was very anxious about you," said he to me; "she wished to come here—"

"Close the door," exclaimed I, "that she may not enter."

"Oh, I reassured her by repeating that you were only tired."

"Very well! leave me—I have something to do."

"But you must be hungry; I will wait on you."

"No, no! I want nothing—go away!"

I was alone.

Night and silence enveloped the chateau. I analyzed, one by one, the terrible symptoms, and I frightened myself by the lucidity with which I recalled to my mind the tragical histories of persons who had been driven mad by avaricious relations. Distracted with terror, I took from my library the works of Esquirol, of Lelest, of Willis, and I read over their essays on mad people; but I found only a source of discouragement. Each portrait of madmen seemed a glass in which I recognized myself, and like an anatomist who feels in his breast the rendings of the scalpel, I passed through the transports, the faintness, the terrors of which I read. I tried to repel these infernal omens. Impossible! An irresistible fascination riveted my eyes on the pages, and breathless I devoured them. Some frightful engine had seized the chain of my ideas, and I must follow on in this horrible evolution, from which I should come out mangled.

I know not how long I rested over this abyss. At one time I found myself gesticulating, like one of the madmen spoken of by Kaulbach. I stood up, the book fell to the floor; I dashed towards it, and trampled it under foot.

XXI.

WHEN the day broke, I arose from my arm-chair, my face wet with tears. The rays of a pale September sun glistened on the yellow leaves, while fogs rose from the lake and floated over the grass-plots like great moving palls; all seemed dying, and the raven wheeled over the towers uttering plaintive cries.

I searched vainly in my mind the reason of my presence in the library. A slight sound was heard at the door. Fritz entered on tiptoe, and, seeing that I no longer slept, "Come in, madam," said he.

At the same instant Diana appeared.

"You here!" exclaimed I, as soon as Fritz left us.

"Yes, I was too anxious," replied she; "I saw your light burning all night, I did not dare to send Catherine, and ten times I thought of coming myself. André, what has happened? You have suffered, I know."

These words recalled my cruel night-watch. "I was a little late about some work," stammered I.

Diana looked at the books scattered on the table; she picked up the one I had trampled on; I tried to take it from her. A page was left in her hand, and she glanced at it.

"Mon Dieu!" said she, overcome.

And we were silent for a moment; everything about me revealed the terrors of the night. The wound of my soul was bare and she feared to irritate it.

"I am very pale; am I not?" murmured I, surprising her eyes fixed on me.

"André! André!" said she, "why expose yourself to this torture?"

"I wished to measure my strength."

"Imprudent! do you not know that such an occupation affects even the strongest mind?

"Yes, I know it," replied I bitterly, "since I have succumbed to it."

"André, what do you mean? In the name of Heaven, do not let yourself be beaten."

"It is finished. I am too tired to sustain the fight."

"But it is to-day that you must plead your cause—have you forgotten it?"

"No, but I have no longer any wish to defend myself; I will not appear before this scornful tribunal. I will go mad. I know it; they spoke truly. What sense is left me here will vanish there. I will not go."

"But it will be to ruin yourself beyond any retrieval. André, think of your future life and your liberty."

"I have no future; my life is aimless. Why should I dispute with them about my liberty? Let them take my property! It would be better thus. My guardian could not at least send me from you, and you will not suffer alone."

"I will not suffer!" cried she, with an accent of reproach, which sent a tremor through me; "Will I not suffer when I see you disgraced! André, my friend, recall your scattered senses. When we were children I swore to your mother to watch over you."

"My heart is dead, and my poor mother died as I shall die."

Diana listened to me, dismayed; for the first time I was deaf to her tenderness.

"No; it is impossible," interrupted she with a gesture of despair. Nothing can allow such a disaster! André, I beseech you on my knees—"

Nearly delirious, at my feet, her eyes dry, she pressed my inert hands in hers; her sorrow was most painful. I felt ashamed.

"Ah, pardon me, pardon me!" exclaimed I. "I am an unhappy man, unworthy of you. I am afraid."

"André, if I am dear to you, do not give up thus; have pity on me. You ruin in one day all my joys in this world! Do not condemn my soul to eternal mourning!"

Her sobs overpowered her voice; I looked at her, stupefied and amazed, and I repeated to myself that word which had already terrified me. "It is a pity! it is a pity!" I remained dismayed and astounded before this sorrow that I would have calmed at the price of my life.

"Ah, let me die! let me die!" murmured I.

Diana looked at me, wildly. I thought for a moment that insanity had seized her, like me; but suddenly straightening herself up against her affliction: "Oh," said she, with an accent of supreme resolution, "what is my repose, my dignity, my happiness? God help, but I must save him." And drying her eyes on her knees before me, her lips quivering, her look bent on mine, "André," said she, in a low tone, but with an accent that made my soul palpitate, "André, I know the secret of your sufferings; you revealed it to me one night in your delirium. You love me!"

"Mon Dieu!" exclaimed I, dismayed.

"André, in my turn I will open my heart to you. I love you. Do you still wish to die?"

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

WHILE Norma was in active rehearsal at the Academy of Music, the Richings' troupe repeated The Doctor of Alcantara and The Daughter of the Regiment. Cleverly as they were both rendered, the houses were poor; neither the sprightliness and novelty of the new opera, nor the popularity of the old one, had the effect of filling the empty benches. Vain alike were the rich voice, artistic graces and natural charms of soprano; vain the chest-notes and beaux yeux of contralto; vain the awful profundity of basso. It was one of those exhibitions, not always confined to the theatrical and musical world, where virtue is its own reward, and pecuniary compensation does not follow the footsteps of excellence and genius.

But Norma, on Monday evening, looked ont from nnder the shade of oak and misletoe to a crowded parquette and a dress circle that was a wreath of bright faces and gay dresses. There had been much expectation, and some little anxiety on the part of the admirers of the young English prima donna, for the role of the Priestess was a severe undertaking. Yet underlying all this was the remembrance of her success in other attempts equally arduous, and that generous enthusiasm and sympathy with the effort which is apt to obtain with most audiences. As the curtain went up with the rising moon and the sublime andante of the first act, this interest reached a climax, and a round of applause followed Casta Diva. It seemed to restore the confidence of Miss Richings, and established her success, though not, in the opinion of many, her best effort that evening. "Pollione" (Mr. Hill) in the second act rose above his rather monotonously sweet level, as though he had absorbed some of the genius of the music. "Adelgisa" (Miss Kempton) was in good voice, and when one became accustomed to the substitution of a contralto for the regular mezzo-soprano of that role, charmed by her recitative, and made one forget her rather tame acting. The voice within "Oreveso," (Mr. Gregg) sounded very well, and would have sounded better, could it have escaped from that gentleman without being overtaken, collared and shaken by him in the very act.

The opera was played three nights, in a manner that seemed to be perfectly satisfactory to the audience, and certainly was creditable to all the performers. And here our criticism might legitimately stop. But Miss Richings has other talents than those which she displays in meeting and overcoming a difficulty and strict justice to her Art will impel her to accept such trial only in an extremity. She cannot long undertake these roles without injury to the natural scope of her voice and style, which belong to a different order of art, though one requiring equally as much genius. The thesis of Norma is semi-religious; the opera is everywhere full of long-sustained strains, dim and far-stretching as cathedral aisles or Druidical groves, ending as mysteriously. It is grand, gloomy and peculiar; its pathos is sublime but hardly tearful; even its jealousy is mixed with gloomy religious frenzy. Now, Miss Richings belongs to this world, and a modern civilization. Her place is the level where people talk not in blank verse but in curt Saxon; where there is much love, jealousy, fun and pathos, but where there is also diversity and transition. In brief, her voice and acting belong to the melo-dramatic school, rather than the tragic or sublime.

The Rose of Tyrol was performed on Thursday night. It was written expressly for Miss Richings by Eichberg, whose Doctor of Alcantara has already become popular here. The new opera, like the Doctor of Alcantara, contains here and there a floating suggestion of other composers, although it has enough originality of style to identify it with the Doctor, as the work of one mind. The plot is simple and amusing, although the interest depends more on the excellent acting and conception of the performers, than any striking quality of dialogue or situation. Miss Richings as "Grittly," a young peasant girl, the (Rose of Tyrol,) and betrothed to "Frantz," (Mr. Hill,) was very natural and vivacious. With the exception of Mr. Seguin, ("Berthold,") and Mr. Richings, ("Schreckenweld,") the remaining characters were acted somewhat boisterously, even for low-comedy. The chorus, Buy, buy, buy, seemed to be most striking, and the best rendered of any. All the duos were good, especially A fool, a fool! between Grittly and her lover.

We regret to be compelled to add that Miss Richings is now so ill from over-exertion that there will be no opera to-night, and that the Academy will be closed until further announcement. She went upon the stage last evening after suffering from a severe spasmodic attack, and sang her role through to the end—a piece of self-sacrifice on her part eminently worthy of praise, though we regret the necessity for its occurrence. Her labors have been decidedly too arduous, and a lessening of them suggests itself as an imperative necessity.

Maguire's Opera House has offered its usual attractions during the week. Last Saturday witnessed the production of Brougham's version of the Duke's Motto. In no material point does it differ from the version which Mr. Allen brought out, the situations being nearly the same, and the language very similar—the natural consequence probably of both dramatizations coming from the same book, and the Allen one being a careful imitation of the other. That Mr. Wheatleigh made a good "Lagardere" we cannot conscientiously say. The part is not at all adapted for him. As the romantic, fiery and dashing young Frenchman he would never have achieved that reputation which he has gained in the sober characters of "Triplet" and "Danny Mann," and the half-earnest, half-humorous one of "Salem Scudder." It may be taken for granted that anything which Mr. Wheatleigh undertakes to play he will play well—so far as mechanical execution is concerned. He will always be found well up in the part, correctly dressed, and excellent in his reading. But if the character does not fit him, all attempts to carry it off triumphantly and win the emphatic tributes which have crowned other of his representations must be manifestly vain. Allen was a sad ranter in his way; he rolled his r's like sweet morsels under his tongue, and he rolled his eyes until every one wondered how much further they could roll without rolling out—he was on the roll all through his role, most emphatically—he mouthed and did a number of other things that were bad—and yet his Lagardére was, as a whole, better than Mr. Wheatleigh's. The one is a bad actor and the other a good one, but in this instance the popular verdict would go to the bad. For the extravagance of Mr. Allen's personation was nearer to the ideal than the coolness and mathematical precision with which Mr. Wheatleigh invested the Frenchman. As "John Mildmay" in Still Waters Run Deep, however, Mr. Wheatleigh had an opportunity of showing his best characteristics. The scene where he confronts and unmasks the villain Hawksley was particularly well rendered. The characters of Lagardere and John Mildmay stand out in direct contrast to each other. To be eminent in both would be simply impossible, for a very different order of talent must be brought to each. As "Capt. Hawksley" Mr. Thorne was very good indeed, and the part of "Mrs. Steruhold" was well carried off by Mrs. Perry. In the afterpiece of The Stage Struck Barber, Mr. Mayo had an opportunity of giving some excellent imitations of actors well known to this coast, and, in conjunction with Mrs. Perry, a chance for making an incalculable quantity of fun. There was too much of it, however, and the piece was fairly too ridiculous to laugh at. Last evening saw the production of The Victims, followed by the ever popular little piece, The Bull in a China Shop. The earliness with which this issue goes to press, however, prevents our making any remark on the performance beyond this simple mention. The American Cousin, with Wheatleigh in his favorite character of "Asa Trenchard," and the very clever little comedy of The Debutante, in which he is excellent as the old Frenchmen, are on the bills for this afternoon and evening.

NEW YORK THEATRICAL GOSSIP.

NEW YORK, July 13, 1864.

YOU are aware that Nero fiddled whilst Rome was in flames. It is one of those precise atoms of mis-information which all writers do resolutely possess themselves of. Nero did nothing of the sort. Fiddles were not known in the first century, and therefore he couldn't fiddle. But—this is a fact—he was busy with the stage when the capital was burning, and examined the ruins in the fantastic dress of a female character he had just been playing at a party of private theatricals.

Somewhat in the spirit of Nero—but not, alas! in his airy costume—do I begin to talk about amusements in New York. To others I leave the graver themes that agitate the public mind. If our Rome is not burning it is in a thundering hot condition. The thermometer is at 90; the rebel raiders are at Baltimore, (almost,) and the Florida is somewhere round the corner, gobbling up our coasting vessels. Here are topics for you, my brilliant and beautiful and auriferous friend. Just think of it! Perhaps this very letter may fall into the hands of the pirate. A couple of days ago he seized the Electric Spark, a New Orleans steamer. Why should he not "try it on" with one of your respectable tubs? I have often wondered what would be the result of such an attempt. Would he chaw or be chawed up?

You ask me for news of the theatres. There are four open on Broadway and two on the Bowery. Although we have had a long-continued spell of hot weather, and it is almost unbearable to sit in-doors, they are all doing well. Your old friend, Moss, is conducting the summer campaign at Wallack's and has opened successfully with the Winning Suit, a well-written play, by Mr. Lewis Fillmore of the London Times, who was in New York some two or three years since. The plot is old-fashioned and improbable, but the action is quick and picturesque, and this pleases the masses. Miss Avonia Jones plays the leading part, and is rather good in it. Without any of the qualities of a great actress, she has the merit of absolute attentiveness. She is watchful of the scene, and does nothing hastily or stupidly whilst on it. Some one has said that genius is nothing but a superior faculty of attention. Perhaps Miss Avonia will yet become a genius, and, in view of that chance, I wish she would cease to speak through her nose. I am thoroughly aware of the meanness of making such a remark; but there it is, and I refuse to strike it out. Leah, by the youthful dramatist, Daly, is said to be the next novelty in preparation; and apropos of this, Figaro of the Leader enquires, with his usual obduracy, who wrote Leah. He is clearly of opinion that Daly did not, although that gentleman claims it as his own, without ever mentioning the name of Mosenthal, from whom it was originally pilfered. The play has had a great success in London, which I have always ascribed to the personal attractiveness and youth of Miss Bateman, rather than to the merits of the drama itself. If on its revival here it pleases the lieges, I shall of course discover my mistake. Mr. Daly, by the way, is the dramatic critic of the Express, having succeeded Otis, retired. He is also agent for Miss Avonia Jones. Rather a good idea that.

No one seems to know anything about Mr. Wallack's arrangements for next season, and some curiosity is expressed as to who is to be the leading lady. Will Mrs. Hoey return to her allegiance?—that is the question. Miss Jane Coombes did not give general satisfaction to the habitués of the theatre, and even if she had done so it is not likely that she would halt on a prosperous career for the sake of accommodating Mr. Wallack. In the absence of Mrs. Hoey and Miss Coombes there remain but Miss Henriques and Mrs. Jennings, neither of whom are strong enough for the business. Miss Henriques has many points in her favor. She is young, pretty, and popular. That she has talent is proved by the fact that Mrs. Hoey left the theatre on her account. But she has not enough talent. Mrs. H. committed an ungracious blunder, for there was nothing to fear from her young rival. The quality that I have referred to in Miss Avonia Jones is precisely the quality that Miss Henriques lacks—namely, attentiveness. She seems to me to speak her lines mechanically, and I have often wondered if she ever read the plays in which she played. The few leading characters which she sustained during the past season did not contribute to her reputation, and I am sorry to find that, on the strength of what candor compels me to say were failures, she has committed the indiscretion of accepting a starring engagement in the country. I fear she will mouth worse than ever when she returns. Mrs. Jennings has played acceptably in Rosedale, and neatly in other pieces, but she is dissatisfied with her lot, and will probably gravitate to another establishment. Truth to say, there is not much to be gained by staying at Wallack's.

Not many hours ago it seemed probable that I should be compelled to announce the loss of the best artiste that ever graced the boards of that house, or in fact of any other—a loss which would have been utterly irreparable. I am fortunately spared this painful task. Miss Mary Gannon—the lady to whom I here refer—has been seriously ill; so seriously that her life was despaired of. She is now improving, and for the moment is considered out of danger. A complication of disorders will, however, leave her health in a precarious state for some time to come. That it may ultimately be restored, is the wish of all who admire good acting.

Niblo's Garden continues to prosper under the management of Mr. Wheatley. The Sea of Ice is the attraction there, with Miss Lucille Western as the heroine. She is a strapping lass and a fair actress. So also is her sister, Miss Helen Western, now playing at the new Broadway Theatre. You will remember this establishment; it used to be Wallack's old theatre, and was carefully ruined by the veteran during the last few months of his lease, in order that, after moving up town, there might be no fire in his rear. It fell into the hands of the Concert Saloon people, and sunk down to the lowest depths of infamy. The German Opera restored its fortunes, but it has never recovered a good kind of audience. Miss Helen Western appears in the French Spy, and displays her understandings to the roughest kind of admirers, who yell and skirl with delight at her movements.

The Olympic Theatre has closed its regular dramatic season, and is now in the hands of an English Opera company, composed of Mme. Borchard, Mr. S. C. Campbell, Mr. Castle, and a few nobodies. The performances are rough and unsatisfactory. The gentlemen neither know how to sing nor to act, although nature has blessed them respectively with good voices. The lady's knowledge of these requisites of her profession is more creditable, but it has come to her too late. I do not expect a very long or a very prosperous career for the undertaking.

A movement is on foot among the actors to combine for an advance of salaries. So far as the ladies of the profession are concerned, it is a proper and reasonable agitation. They have to supply their own wardrobes, and the cost of all articles of attire has doubled during the past year. Without a material increase in their remuneration, I do not see how they can make both ends meet. The majority of male actors here are so bad that they deserve no sort of consideration at all. If they receive the wages of mechanics, it is as much as they are entitled to. With which amiable expression of opinion I close this screed.

LUBIN.

ERRORS OF THE PRESS.—I have been referred to a volume of popular sermons, in which, owing to the negligence of the proof-readers, a deplorable number of typographical errors appeared. One of these, as if in reference to the others, was singularly appropriate to the unhappy circumstances of the poor author; the verso, "Princes have persecuted me without a cause," reading, "Printers have persecuted me without a cause." Campbell's celebrated Essay on Miracles appeared in one of the advertisements as Campbell's "Essay on Mangles." In newspaper articles of my own I have had the misfortune to see "the internal relations of the Church" converted into "the infernal relations of the Church," and people who "spoke the Gælic language" were made to "smoke" it. I remember a great public demonstration that took place in a town in which I was residing at the time. After one or two unimportant speeches, a certain demagogue arose whose appearance was the signal for loud and enthusiastic cheering from the multitude. A party newspaper describing this, in the course of its gratulatory and fervid report, said that the vast concourse had "rent the air with their snouts."—Once a Week.

TO ALTHEA, FROM PRISON.

Lovelace wrote this song when confined in the Gate House at Westminster, for presenting a petition "from the whole body of the County of Kent to the House of Commons, for restoring the King (Charles I.) to his rights." "The Song to Althea," says Southey, "will live as long as the English language."

WHEN Love with unconfinèd wings
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at my grates;
When I lie tangled in her hair,
And fettered to her eye,
The birds that wanton in the air,
Know no such liberty.

When flowing cups run swiftly round
With no allaying Thames,
Our careless heads with roses bound,
Our hearts with loyal flames;
When thirsty grief in wines we steep;
When healths and draughts are free—
Fishes that tipple in the deep
Know no such liberty.

When like committed linnets, I
With shriller throat shall sing
The sweetness, mercy, majesty,
And glories of my king;
When I shall voice aloud how good
He is, how great should be—
Enlarged winds that curl the flood
Know no such liberty.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage:
If I have freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free,
Angels alone, that soar above,
Enjoy such liberty.

—Richard Lovelace, (Born 1618—Died 1658.)

The Indecisiveness of our Battles.—There has been very much said about the indecisiveness of all the numerous battles of this war. But, in fact, there have been very many decisive battles. We may look at the decisiveness of field actions in three aspects: First, battles which are decisive simply of the field—of which we have a favorable example in Murfreesboro, and an adverse example in Fredericksburg. Secondly, battles which are decisive of the war in large States, or over great surfaces of country—of which Fort Donelson, which ended the war in Kentucky; Pea Ridge, which ended it in Missouri, and Vicksburg, which ended it on the Mississippi, are examples. Thirdly, battles which are absolutely decisive of the whole fortunes of the war and of the fate of the parties or countries involved—of which latter class, in its largest aspect, we have perhaps not yet had an example. Professor Creasy, of England, wrote a book entitled the Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World, and by decisive battles he meant such battles as effected the whole course of history, as regards the combatants, and which, had they issued oppositely to what they did, would have resulted in a condition of affairs permanently different from that which we now see or have seen. Fixing upon such battles by tracing up to them through the subsequent and intricate course of historical events, as Creasy does, we say we really cannot yet settle definitely whether or not such a battle has been fought. We cannot yet see events through the long perspective as our posterity a hundred years hence will be enabled to do, nor can we take in the full scope and bearing of actions that have already transpired or are now transpiring. But may we not suggest that Gettysburg was perhaps a decisive battle, even in the largest sense? Had the issue of that great day been defeat instead of victory to our arms, the National Capital would have fallen. Baltimore and Philadelphia would have fallen—and beyond this what shall we conjecture, either as regards event or consequence? It may appear, when the history of this whole war can be fully surveyed, that that battle not only saved the North, but really broke the South—that it was the critical event of the war, the turning point in all its fortunes. And this by no means belittles the mighty work we now have in hand, or the mighty work we yet have to do.

Blucher and his Pipe.—Here is an incident of 1815, which the English journals are relating: On the morning of the memorable battle of Waterloo, Henneman had just handed his master (Blucher) a lighted pipe, when a cannon ball struck the ground close by, scattering earth and gravel in all directions, and causing the white charger on which Blucher was mounted to spring aside—a manœuvre that broke the pipe into a thousand pieces before the owner had time even to lift it to his lips.

"Just keep a lighted pipe ready for me: I shall be back in a few moments, after I have driven away the rascally French churls."

With these words Blucher gave the command, "Forward, boys!" and off he galloped with his cavalry. Instead, however, of a chase of a few minutes, it was a rapid march of nearly a whole hot summer day, as we all know from history. After the battle was over, Blucher rode back with Wellington to the place where he first got a glimpse of the combatting armies, and nearing the spot where Blucher had halted in the morning, they saw to their great surprise a solitary man, his head tied with a handkerchief, one arm in a sling, and calmly smoking a pipe!

"Donner und Blitz!" cried Blucher, "why, that is my Henneman. How you look, boy; what are you doing here alone?"

"Waiting for your speedy return," was the grumbling answer. "You have come at last! I have waited for you here, pipe in mouth, for the whole long day. This is the last pipe in the box. The cursed French have shot away every pipe from my mouth, have ripped the flesh from my head, and shattered my arm with their deuced bullets. It is well there is an end to the battle, or you would have been too late even for the last pipe."

Saying which, he handed to Blucher the pipe, to enjoy the remaining fumes of the weed. Wellington, who had listened attentively to the conversation, here remarked to Blucher: "You have just admired the unflinching loyalty and bravery of my Highlanders, what shall I say to this true and devoted soul?" "But your Highlanders had no pipe to regale themselves with."

THE NOTTING HILL MYSTERY.

SECTION IV.

1.—Memorandum by Mr. Henderson.

IN the following certificate you will perceive that the lady is described as of "Acacia Cottage, Kensington." The identity of the name with that given by both Julie and Leopoldo, as the proper designation of the Baron's "medium," confirmed my suspicion that it was in fact to the girl Rosalie that the Baron was married under that name, notwithstanding the strong opinion of Julie as to the impossibility of such being the case. Still, however, it was possible that this might after all, be a mere coincidence; and I therefore proceeded to make such inquiries as seemed most likely to elucidate the point. I had considerable difficulty in finding the house, which two or three years back was included in the regular numbering of the row of similar tenements in which it stands; but I at last succeeded in identifying it. I found the landlady a very deaf old person, whose memory was evidently failing her, and was at first unable to extract from her any kind of information on the subject, except that "she had had a great many lodgers, and couldn't be expected to know all about all of them." In the course of a second visit, however, I succeeded in persuading her to favor me with a sight of her books, and looking back to October and November, 1854, I found the sum of £2 5s., entered as payment from Miss C. Brown of three weeks' rent, from the 18th October to the 8th November.*

* Compare Sections II., 2 and 5; and III., 1.

On further examining the books, I found that at this time, while the other lodgers were charged sundry sums for fire, Miss Brown, though occupying the principal sitting-room, had no fire at all during the whole time of her tenancy, though the commencement of November of that year was unusually cold. There were also sundry other little charges invariable in the other cases, but omitted in case of Miss Brown; and at length on these things being pointed out to her, the old lady managed to remember that the rooms had been taken by a gentleman for a lady who was to give lessons in drawing. The gentleman had paid the three weeks' rent in advance, and had specially requested that they might be kept vacant for her, as the time of her arrival was uncertain. He had also begged that any letters or messages received for her should be sent to a certain address immediately. After a good deal of searching, this address was at length found, and proved to be the square glazed card which I enclose.

2.—Letters or messages for Miss Brown to be forwarded immediately to the care of

Baron R.,

Post Office, Notting Hill.

The old lady further stated that she never saw the gentleman again, and that she had never seen the lady at all. In fact, after payment of the money, nothing further had been heard of either of the parties concerned; and as no inquiries had been made for Miss Brown, the subject had altogether passed from her mind.

Being thus pretty well satisfied of the identity of Mme. R., my next care was to trace the proceedings of the Baron between the time of his marriage and the death of his wife, which took place, as you are aware, in London, about two years and a half subsequently; the insurances having, as you well know, been effected about the middle of this period. The information afforded me by Dr. Jones, the medical man who signed the certificate to your office in connection with the policy on the life of Madame R., first gave me the required clue, and you will, I think, find in the depositions immediately following, sufficient, at all events, to justify, if not entirely corroborate, the suspicions which first gave rise to my inquiries. It is certainly unfortunate that here, too—as in the case of Mr. Aldridge, whose letter first aroused these suspicions—the witness on whose evidence the principal stress must be laid, is not one whose testimony would probably carry much weight with a jury. Such, however, as it is, I have felt it my duty to lay it before you; and I will now leave it, with such other as I have been able to collect, to tell its own tale.

3.—Statement of Mrs. Whitworth.

My name is Jane Whitworth. I am a widow, and gain my living by letting apartments at Bognor, Sussex. The principal season at Bognor is during the Goodwood races, and there are very few visitors there in the autumn and winter. On the 6th of October, 1854, I let the whole upper part of my house to a lady and gentleman who arrived there late that evening. They gave some foreign name; I forget what. It was some long German name. They did not give the name at first. Not till I asked for it. I don't know that the gentleman was particularly unwilling. I said I wanted it for my bill; and he laughed and said it did not matter—anything would do. Then I said, if letters came; and he said: "Oh! there won't be any letters," and went on reading the paper. I went down stairs, and as I was going down he rang, and I went back, and he told me of his own accord. That was at the end of the first week when I was making out my bill. They said they intended remaining for some weeks. It was the gentleman who said this. The lady took no part in the business, and seemed out of spirits, and very much afraid of her husband. He settled with me to take the apartments at thirty shillings a week. He was to remain as long as he liked. Not beyond the next race week, of course. We never let over the race week. He also made an agreement with me about board. I was to find for him and the lady and the servant, for £2 15s. a week. That was without wine, beer, or spirits. It is not a usual arrangement. We do it sometimes—not often. The gentleman said it was because his wife was not well, and could not be troubled. The servant was his. It was a maid. She did not come with them. The gentleman hired her at Brighton. That is not a usual arrangement. Certainly not. I never made such a one before, and I told him so. He said it was because he was so particular about his servants. He said he never would live where the servants were not under his own hand—where he could not turn them away. I said I did not like it, it was not the custom. He said he was sorry, but he could not take the apartments without it, and then I gave way. Afterwards he followed me down stairs, and gave me to understand it was something about his wife. At first, I thought she was not quite right in her head. That was from what he told me. I said I should be afraid to have her in the house, but he laughed, and said it was not that. I then supposed it must be temper. He was very pleasant about it. He was always very pleasant to me. I don't know what he may have been to other people. I always had my money to the day, and he was always pleasant. I can't say better than that. He got a servant a few days after they came. I did not turn away my own. I had none at the time. The season being over, it was a great chance whether I let again, and I sent my servant away, and did for myself. A charwoman did for the gentleman till he got a servant. He got one from Brighton. I recommended two or three in Bognor, but they did not suit. The one he got was a girl about 20. Her name was Sarah Something. I did not think much of her. I used sometimes to think my tea and sugar went very fast. I never caught her taking anything. She was very quiet and civil. She stayed with the gentleman not quite a month. She was sent away for giving the lady a dose of physic in her arrow-root to make her sick. The lady was very bad indeed. We thought she would have died. She was dreadfully sick, and had the cholera awfully bad. This was the 9th of December. I know it from my books. The gentleman sent out for brandy and several things, and they are down in my book. On the following morning he sent for some stuff from the chemist's. Before that he had given her some medicine himself. I don't know what it was. He had a lot of chemicals and things. He kept them in a back room. The lady had a doctor. Not at first. Not till the Monday after she was ill. I asked him to send for one, but he said he was a doctor himself. She continued very ill, and on Sunday night I asked him again. He said if she was not better next morning, he would. I wanted him to send for Dr. Pesketh or Dr. Thompson, but he would not. He said they were no good. I have always heard them very highly spoken of. Dr. Pesketh I have always heard of as a first-rate doctor. He is since dead. Dr. Thompson is a very good doctor, too; but Dr. Pesketh, perhaps, had most practice. I don't think the gentleman knew anything about either of them. He sent for a Dr. Jones, who was in lodgings in the Steyne. I believe he lived in London. He prescribed for the lady while he stayed in Bognor. He went away the week after. He was only there a fortnight. The gentleman heard of him through a friend of mine in the Steyne. He asked me to find out whether there was no London doctor in the place. He would not have any one who belonged to the place. He said country doctors were no good. The lady got better, but very slowly. She was ill several weeks. When she was strong enough they went away. He was very attentive to her. Never left her alone for a minute hardly. She did not seem very fond of him. I think she was afraid of him, but I don't know why. He was very kind to her, and always particularly civil. Sometimes she seemed quite put out like by his civility. I thought sometimes she would have flown out at him. She never did fly out. He always seemed able to stop her. I don't know how he did it. He never said anything; only looked at her; but it was quite enough. I thought she must have been doing something wrong, and he had brought her to Bognor to be out of the way. I do not know exactly what made me think so. It was the way they went on, and what he said to me. He never told me so. It was from things he said. I did not talk much to the lady. I thought her very ungrateful when he was so kind. Then she was hardly ever alone. Only once when the gentleman went out for something. Then she was left about an hour. She was writing part of the time. She borrowed writing materials of me. There were none in the sitting-room. There usually were, but the gentleman had sent the inkstand down stairs. He said it was sure to be upset. I lent the lady the things, and she gave me two letters for the post. She did not say anything to me; only asked me to post them immediately. One was addressed to Notting Hill. I noticed that, because I have a sister living there; the other was to some theatre. I forget where. It struck me, because I thought it odd that a lady should write to a theatre. I didn't think it was right. I would rather not say what I thought. Well, it was that she was connected with some one there. Improperly, of course. The letter was not adnressed to a man. It was "Miss Somebody," but that might be a blind. I thought this might account for her behavior to her husband. I was very angry. A woman has no business to go on so. It is particularly bad when she has such a good husband. I did not say this to her. I did not notice the address till I got down stairs. I kept the letters, and told the gentleman when he came in. He seemed very much vexed. He took the letters, and was very much obliged to me. He put the letter to the theatre into the fire without opening it. The other he said he would post himself. I don't know whether he did post it, or not. I suppose so, of course. I think he spoke to the lady about it. I am sure he did, for that night when I went up, I could see she had been crying, and she would never speak to me again. She spoke English quite well. The letters were addressed in English. When she spoke to the gentleman it was generally in some foreign language, but she could speak English perfectly. I do not know what became of the girl, Sarah. I think she went into service again at Brighton. I know the gentleman gave her a character. He was very kind to her. He was always very kind. He was the pleasantest and most civil-spoken gentleman I ever met, and I think his wife behaved very bad to him.

4. Statement of Dr. Jones, of Gower street, Bedford Square.

I am a physician, residing in Gower street, Bedford Square. In the beginning of December, 1854, I was suffering from a severe cold, and being unable to shake it off, went for a fortnight to the sea for change of air. I selected Bognor, because I had been in the habit of spending my holidays there for two or three years. I was lodging in the Steyne. Some few days after my arrival, I received a message requesting me to call and see a lady who was dangerously ill at a lodging in another part of the town. At first I declined to go, not wishing to interfere with the established practitioners of the place. A gentleman then called upon me, and gave the name of the Baron R. He informed me that the lady in question was his wife, and that she was dangerously ill from the effects of a considerable quantity of emetic tartar administered to her by the maid. He was very urgent with me to attend, saying that he was in the greatest anxiety about his wife, and that he could not, in such a case, sufficiently rely upon the skill of any country doctor. He pressed me so strongly, that I at length consented to accompany him to his lodgings. I found the patient in a very exhausted condition, and evidently suffering from the effects of some irritant poison. From what the Baron told me, the symptoms were much abated, but the purging still continued, accompanied with severe griping pains and profuse perspirations. I learned from the Baron that, being himself a good amateur chemist, and having accidentally discovered at the outset the origin of his wife's illness, he had so far treated her himself, rather than trust to the chance of a country physician. He described his treatment, which appeared to me perfectly correct. On becoming satisfied of the cause of the disturbance, he first promoted vomiting as much as possible by the exhibition of tepid water, and afterwards of warm water, with a small quantity of mustard. When no more food appeared to be left in the stomach, he then administered large quantities of a saturated infusion of green tea, of which he had a few pounds at hand for his own drinking, and, finally, at the time of my arrival, was exhibiting considerable doses of decoction of Peruvian bark: both which remedies are recommended by Professor Taylor in cases of antimonial poisoning. Their action left no doubt on my mind as to the origin of the symptoms; but by desire of the Baron I proceeded to analyse with him portions of the vomited and excreted matter, as also a portion of the arrow-root in which the tartarized antimony was supposed to have been administered. To all of these we together applied the usual tests, viz.: nitric acid, ferrocyanide of potassium, and hydrosulphuret of ammonia; and succeeded in ascertaining beyond doubt the presence of antimony in all three. The quantity, however, appears to have been small. So far as we could ascertain, there could not have been more than one, or at the most two grains of tartarized antimony in the arrow-root, of which not much more than three parts was eaten. I cannot account for the violent action of so small a quantity. I have frequently administered much larger doses in cases of inflammation of the lungs without ill effect. Two grains is by no means an unusual dose when intended to act as an emetic; but the action of antimony varies greatly with different constitutions. Having satisfied ourselves of the presence of the suspected poison, the question was, as to the person by whom it had been administered. The Baron said he had no doubt that it was a trick on the part of the servant maid, between whom and her mistress there had been some dispute a few days since. We therefore determined on taxing her with it; but before doing so, proceeded to examine a bottle of prepared tartar emetic, which, as the Baron informed me, he kept for his own use, being subject to digestive derangement. He was, I believe, addicted to the pleasures of the table, and was in the habit of taking an occasional emetic. The bottle was not in its usual place, but was standing on the table at the side of the dressing-case in which it was usually kept. It was labeled "The emetic; one tea-spoonful to be taken as directed." I remarked that it should be labelled "poison," and the Baron quite agreed with me, and immediately wrote the word in large characters on a piece of paper and gummed it round the bottle. We then weighed the contents, from which three doses only had been taken by the Baron, and, on comparing the results, we found that a quantity equivalent to about one grain and a-half of the tartarised antimony had been abstracted in excess of this amount. The servant maid was the only person besides the Baron who usually had access to the apartment; and we at once sent for her and taxed her with having administered it to Madame R. in the arrow-root before mentioned. My own counsel was to give her immediately in charge, but the Baron pointed out, very justly, that there was nothing to show the girl that she was doing anything that could possibly affect life; and that, in the absence of any motive for such a crime, it was only fair to conclude that nothing was intended beyond a foolish practical joke. He said the same to the girl, and spoke to her very kindly indeed. At first she altogether denied it, and pretended to be quite astonished at such an imputation. The Baron, however, looked steadily at her and said, "Take care, Sarah! Remember what I said to you only three days ago." She did not attempt then to deny it any longer, but said she was very sorry, but she hoped the Baron would forgive her. The Baron said he could not possibly retain her in his service, and she then begged of him not to send her away without a character. At this time I interfered, and said he would be very wrong to send her into any other family after playing such a trick. She again protested that she had meant no harm, and the subject then dropped, the Baron saying that he would take time to consider it. From that time I attended Madame R. until my return to London, when she was clearly recovering. I did not enter into any conversation with her, as she seemed very reserved and of an unsociable disposition. The Baron seemed an unusually attentive husband. Talking over the subject of the seizure a day or two afterwards, he informed me that the death of his wife would also have been a severe loss in a pecuniary point of view, as if she lived she would inherit a considerable fortune. I asked him why he did not insure her life, and he said he should now certainly do so, but had not before thought of it. He called upon me about two months later, in passing through town, and informed me that he intended to travel abroad for some months. I recommended the German baths, and on his objecting to the crowds of English there, suggested Griesbach or Rippoldsau, in the Black Forest, where Englishmen are rarely encountered. It was too early for either place at that time, and I recommended the south of France until the season was sufficiently advanced. I did not see him again until October, 1855, when he again called upon me with Madame R., who seemed perfectly restored, and of whom I had no difficulty in reporting most favorably to the —— Life Assurance Association, as also some weeks later to the —— Life Office of Dublin, when applied to for my professional opinion. I think Madame R.'s was an excellent life, and there could be no better proof of it than her entire recovery in the course of a few months, or, indeed weeks, from so severe an illness. The sensitiveness to antimony would not affect this opinion. Indeed, Professor Taylor, in his work on poisons, points out distinctly the "idiosyncratic" action of antimony and other medicinals on certain constitutions, as "conferring upon an ordinary medicinal dose a poisonous instead of a curative action." I have a copy of his work now before me, in which he says "that daily experience teaches us that some persons are more powerfully affected than others by an ordinary dose of opium, arsenic, antimony, and other substances;" and again, in considering the probable amount of the "fatal dose," he speaks of "that ever-varying condition of idiosyncracy, in which, as it is well known, there is a state of constitution more liable to be affected by antimonial compounds than other individuals apparently in the same conditions as to health, age," etc. I did not, therefore, nor do I now, consider the sensitiveness of Madame R.'s constitution to that medicine any objection to her life, especially in view of the immense vitality shown by her recovery. With regard to the sleep-walking, I have had no hint from the Baron of such a propensity on the part of Madame R. Certainly it was never suggested that she could have poisoned herself in that way. Indeed, the servant girl admitted the act. The mode of Madame R.'s death does not in any degree shake my confidence in my former opinion, as such an occurrence might have happened, though by no means likely to do so, to any one in the habit of walking in their sleep, a propensity which in Madame R.'s case I had no means of ascertaining. I have been enabled to be thus precise in my statement, from the fact that the interesting nature of the case led me to make a special memorandum of it in my diary, from which the above is taken. I shall therefore have no difficulty in confirming any portion of it upon oath.

5. Statement of Mrs. Throgmorton.

Mrs. Throgmorton presents her compliments to Mr. R. Henderson, and begs to inform him that the girl Sarah Newman, who is still in her service, and continues to give entire satisfaction in every way, came to her about Christmas, 1854, with a written character from the Baron R., then residing at Bognor, and with whom she had been as housemaid and parlormaid for some weeks. The character given by the Baron was a most satisfactory one, but on Mrs. Throgmorton's desiring to know the reason of Sarah Newman's leaving the situation, she was informed by the Baron that it was on account of her having played a foolish trick upon her late mistress by administering an emetic to her without authority, a highly reprehensible proceeding, which rendered Mrs. Throgmorton very much indisposed to receive her into her family. On further correspondence with Sarah Newman's late master, however, Mrs. Throgmorton received the impression that the fault had, in point of fact, been chiefly on the side of Madame R., though, of course, as a gentleman, impossible to say so directly with respect to his own wife, and Mrs. Throgmorton therefore agreed to take Sarah Newman on trial, as she appeared truly penitent for her most reprehensible conduct, and has since proved a very valuable servant in every respect. Mrs. Throgmorton trusts that this information will be satisfactory to Mr. Henderson, as he appears interested in Sarah Newman's welfare, in whom Mrs. Throgmorton herself takes great interest.

6. Statement of Mr. Andrews.

"Sir.—In reply to your letter of the 15th ult., I beg to inform you, that the girl, Sarah Newman, certainly was in my service at Brighton for a month or two in the summer of 1854, but was discharged, I think, in September of that year, for various petty thefts. She was a very interesting girl, and took us in completely, but was accidentally discovered by one of the children, and after full proof of her delinquencies, turned away without a character. My own wish was to prosecute her, which indeed I considered almost a duty to others by whom she might hereafter be plundered, but I was persuaded to relinquish my intention by my wife, who had taken a great fancy to her. About two months after her dismissal, a gentleman, who gave some German name—I cannot now remember it—called to inquire our reasons for discharging her, and I then informed him of the whole case. He questioned me pretty closely as to my real opinion of the girl, stating that he was philanthropically disposed, and would give her a chance for reform, if there was any likelihood of her availing herself of it. I told him frankly my own opinion, viz: that the girl was a hardened offender; but my wife was very anxious that she should have another chance, and I have very little doubt the German gentleman took her. He was, so far as I remember, a stout good-natured looking man, and he had with him a young lady whom he left in the carriage, and who was, he said, his wife. I think the name you mention—Baron R., is the same name as that given—or at least something like it—but I cannot be quite sure, "Dear sir, faithfully yours,

"Charles Andrews.

"P. S.—My wife begs me to ask that should you know anything of the after-career of her protégée, you will kindly communicate it to us.

"R. Henderson, Esq., etc. etc. etc., Clement's Inn, W. C."

7. Statement of Sarah Newman.

[N. B.—This statement was not obtained without considerable difficulty, and must be taken for whatever it may be worth. The girl was naturally anxious to be secured against the possible consequences of her own admissions, and I only at last succeeded in inducing her to speak out by means both of a promise on the part of Mrs. Throgmorton not to discharge her, and a threat of police interference, if she did not confess the whole truth. I have, myself, no doubt whatever of the correctness of her statement as it now stands, and it is, as you will see, corroborated in several very important particulars; but whether it could be produced before a jury, or, if it were so, what effect it would have upon their minds, are both very doubtful questions.—R. H.]

My name is Sarah Newman. I was in the service of Mr. Andrews at Brighton for three months. I was discharged by him for stealing tea and sugar. Mr. Andrews wanted to take the law of me, but my mistress would not let him. My mistress would have kept me on, but master said, No. She was always very kind to me, and it was very ungrateful of me to rob her. I would never do so again. My present mistress is very kind to me, too. I have never robbed her of a pin. I declare to goodness I have not, nor I never will steal from anybody again. I have often wanted to tell Mrs. Andrews so since, but did not know where she was. I did not say it to her when I left. I felt quite hard like, because of master. I was out of place two months after that. No one would take me without a character. At last a friend at Bognor told me of a gentleman, and I got her to speak to him. It was the Baron. He came to see me one day when he was at Brighton. He insisted on knowing all about me—where I had been and why I had left Mr. Andrews. He was very kind, and said it was hard a poor girl should be ruined for one false step. He said if I promised never to steal again he would give me a trial. I promised him faithfully, and he at last took me down to Bognor with him. I do not know whether he made any inquiries about me. I think not. He did not tell me he had. I meant to keep my promise. Indeed I did, and I did keep it, almost. I mean I only took one little thing, and I really did not think that was stealing. Nothing was ever locked up. The Baron always insisted on having the tea-chest and other things left open in case he wanted some. I never took any. I might have taken a great deal, but I did not. I used to think sometimes things were left on purpose to tempt me, but of course that was fancy. Often there were coppers left about, but I never touched them. I did take one thing at last. I did not think it was stealing. It was only some orange-marmalade. I am very fond of sweet things. One day there was a pot of orange-marmalade. It was left on the table. It was after they had gone away from breakfast. I couldn't help it. It looked so nice. I just put in my finger. That was all. I declare to goodness that was all. I did not even taste it. The Baron came back and caught me. He did not say anything. He just shut the door close and walked straight up to me. I was so frightened I could not move. He took hold of my wrist and held up my hand. I burst out crying. He said it was no use crying; I had deceived him, and must go. He said if he did his duty he ought to give me up to the police. I said indeed I had taken nothing, but only that little taste of sweets. He said who would believe me with my character? He spoke very kind but very stern, and I was dreadfully frightened. I begged of him not to give me up, and he said he would give me one chance more; but I must go away. I said if he turned me out without a character I might as well drown myself at once. I begged him to let me stay; but he said that was impossible. Then I begged him not to say why I was sent away. He said, what else could he say? I begged him again very hard. At last he said he would think over it. He said, he would try and make some other excuse for my going, but I must go next day, positive. He told me if he did make an excuse for me to be very careful not to contradict him. He is a kind, good gentleman, and I shall always bless him for it. I did not go next day. I was kept by my mistress's illness. She was very bad indeed. I did all I could for her. I hoped the Baron had forgotten and would let me stay. He sent for me two or three days afterwards. There was another gentleman with him. It was the doctor. He charged me with having given some stuff to my mistress to make her sick. Of course I denied it. I never gave her anything. I never had any quarrel with her at all. She was always very good-natured to me, but I did not like her much. I don't know why. I think it was because she did not like master. I said I had given her nothing. No more I had. I never saw the bottle, and don't know what it was. I cannot read at all. I saw master look at me, and he said something about two or three days ago. I knew then that he was making an excuse to send me away. He made signs at me to abide by what he said, and I did abide by it. The other gentleman was very hard, but of course he did not know. What the Baron said was given as a reason for my going away. That was all. The real reason was my taking the marmalade. If you ask the Baron he will tell you so. I hope you will tell him how grateful I am for his kindness to me.

You know the story of the boy who would not cry, though the wolf was gnawing him beneath his frock. Most of us have some wolf to gnaw us somewhere; but we are generally gnawed beneath our clothes, so that the world doesn't see, and it behooves us so to bear it that the world shall not suspect. The man who goes about proclaiming himself to be miserable will be not only miserable but contemptible as well.—Anthony Trollope.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1864.

LOST RICHES.

HOW much poorer this community now is than it was six months ago we do not exactly know, but the sum could only be measured by millions. In most cases it so happens that what one man loses another gains, so that the public is not impoverished, the same amount of money remaining in existence that was in circulation before. But instances of depreciation like the withering one that has just swept over the stock-market have no palliative feature of that kind. The bottom has dropped out from any number of pockets, and the riches they contained or were supposed to contain are quietly wiped away. Not very long ago, by way of example, the man who had one hundred feet of Gould and Curry was worth $500,000. The same man is now worth but $100,000—$400,000 having slipped away from him as noiselessly and quietly as smoke rises in the air, and no one is the better for it. Taking the whole Gould and Curry mine—there are 1,200 feet in it we believe—it at one time had a market valuation of six millions of dollars, which could have been put down to the credit of this coast fairly enough. Had it been sold to foreign capitalists, that amount would have been positively added to the wealth of the country. As the stock at present stands, five million dollars have vanished, and where they have gone to no one knows. We have only mentioned one representative instance. Run over the stock list and compare it with the record a few months since, and it will be seen that millions and millions of supposed wealth has quietly been wiped out of existence. It is as though the money which our citizens kept in their strong boxes had suddenly turned into leaves, leaving them poor and benefiting nobody. That a general gloom and prostration should spread over the community under such circumstances, affecting all kinds of business, is scarcely to be wondered at. People who counted themselves rich have suddenly found themselves poor—wretchedly, unmistakably poor. To all intents and purposes, the effect is very similar to that which would be produced by an actual withdrawal from the capital of the country of just so much money as these mining stocks at their former values represented. Or, to put the matter in another shape, our flush times were caused by an inflation of the currency. All the while that we were priding ourselves on our gold and silver currency, a paper currency was actually in existence—the only difference being that we issued and circulated mining stock instead of greenbacks. And the depreciation and distress which at present exist result simply from a discovery that "things are not what they seem." If stocks would only go up again to their former figures, good times would be restored, and we would all be rich once more. Or, perhaps, to flood the country with greenbacks would answer the same purpose—carrying out the principle of the boy who threw a counterfeit bank-note into the contribution-box, explaining the apparently wicked fraud by saying that it was going to the little heathens who wouldn't know the difference and for whom it would of course answer just as well. An upward movement in stocks just now would stir business as a fair strong breeze does a becalmed ship, and restore to us the hypothetical riches which so suddenly took unto themselves wings and departed.

SEA SHOWS FOR THE BENEFIT OF LAND LUBBERS.

IT was a very pretty little fight that which came off just off Cherbourg, and one well worth seeing. Ladies and gentlemen drove out of town in their buggies, and viewed the scene through jewelled opera glasses, the former applauding with their gloved hands, and beating time to the boom of cannon with their dear little fans precisely as they would had they been at the Grand Opera. One can fancy Marie Theresa Louise clinging to Achille Alphonse's arm, and crying in the thinnest treble: "Ah, mon ami! c'est joli—n'est-ce pas? And the old dowager seated on the cliff, the while, pulling her gushing daughter's sleeve and requesting her not to give way so unrestrainedly to her enthusiasm and not to cling quite so closely to Achille. In those two grim sea-warriors going out to that combat a l'outrance, calmly as two Dutchmen might sit down to smoke their pipes together, the hum of busy cities within ear-shot, church spires in sight, and the chimneys of cottages sending up their beacons of peace to the sky, there was something more than romantic; it verged closely upon the sublime. It was so that mailed knights went out to do battle in the olden time, when ladies viewed the joust and rained favors down upon the combatants. It was more than the sight of a whale to a dairy maid of the interior, whose only knowledge of the world of water and its wonders has been gathered from the kitchen pump. And we can well understand how cities were emptied to see the great sea-battle done, and how the cliffs overlooking the scene were converted into a wilderness of ribands and fluttering veils.

It seems that the people so fortunate as to dwell along the British channel are to be again regaled with a sea-fight, and this time a "song of seven"—the Confederate war steamer Syren and the corvettes Butterfly, Paul Jones and Vigie Dechenbourg being reported in the channel with the Federal vessels Niagara, Sacramento and Kearsarge cruising in the vicinity. This looks like music. Here is a prospective demand for opera glasses and a use for English yachts. But will the French be the favored ones this time? or will the fun fall so far over the Channel as to benefit the Cockneys? or, after all, is the story one of those canards which are set flying to beget a little popular excitement and turn to the advantage of some shrewd speculator? Probably, reserved seats to witness the combat are even now obtainable on both sides of the channel. For our part we do not believe that there is going to be such a fight—Confederate Commissions do not warrant their naval officers in undertaking exhibitions of valor. Capt. Semmes was commissioned to sink and not to be sunk—he overstepped the line of his duty decidedly. If a fight comes off, however, we insist that an enclosure be erected, that an admittance fee of at least one dime per caput be established, and that the receipts be given to the Sanitary Fund.

SUNDAY THEATRICALS.

THE question of whether or not theatrical managers have a right to keep their places of amusement open on Sunday nights is now being tried in the County Court. Manager Maguire takes the affirmative; the District Attorney appearing for Sabbatarians and the Decalogue. Whatever opinion may obtain with the jury relative to the legal points of the case, and with the public at large so far as its moral aspect is concerned, we fancy there can be but one opinion, if the question is viewed in another light—making the rights of the performers the hinge upon which the decision is to turn. Few will deny that actors are human, though since it is a favorite practice with many to bar them out from the pale of humanity, we do not insist upon being allowed to maintain the position, it being quite possible to carry our argument from another point of view. One day's rest in seven is a necessity for every created thing, and in the relaxation from labor which the Sabbath is supposed to bring, a human need is met quite as much as a divine law complied with. The present system of Sunday theatricals allows the actor no rest, his work being quite as arduous on Sunday as on any day of the week. He is surely entitled to the same privilege which the employé in a foundry, a butcher's shop or a dry goods store demands and obtains as a right. The laborer is worthy of his rest as well as of his hire. And we do not think that the interests of the proprietor of a theatre are at all advanced by playing seven nights of the week instead of six. People are bound to spend a certain amount of money in amusements anyway, and they very seldom spend either more or less. Those who now go on Sunday night would go on some other night of the week; and the theatre's receipts at the close of a month would not, we fancy, show any diminution were the Sunday evening performances discontinued. On the other hand, we think they would be benefited, inasmuch as one night's expenses would be saved—no inconsiderable item. At any rate we would like to see the experiment tried for a month.

These are the times that try newspapers. There seems to be a universal movement at the East, towards advancing the price of journals, and in some instances cutting down the size as well. And we observe that the necessity has made itself apparent here, several of our exchanges coming to us in decidedly reduced proportions. There is wisdom in this on the part of the proprietors. It is decidedly better to diminish than to die. If the press at the East cannot stand the press, what is to be expected of the press in this country, where printing paper is even higher, printer's wages nearly double, and the field for circulation comparatively limited. When doubling the capes that lie to the southward, or crossing rough latitudes, ships at sea send down their royal poles and topgallant masts. It is a wise measure of precaution, though the ship for the time is not so pretty a sight to see. Journalists generally have a careful eye to windward. When you see the white sails of their crafts shortened, be sure that what seaman call "dirty weather" is near at hand. Taking their action as an index of what may be expected, people may as well begin retrenchment at once.

A remarkable case of very "early piety" has just been found in Brussels. The Police, making their rounds at midnight, found an ordinary clothes-line hanging near a door, several feet above the ground, and tracing its history discovered that it came out of a garret-window above. They entered the house, convinced that they were on the track of some daring burglar, searched all the premises, and at last on walking into the garret were horrified to find themselves confronted by a housemaid, in a very easy evening dress, who, with many tears, explained that the mysterious clothes-line was attached to her left arm, in order that a young waiter to whom she was herself attached, coming early in the morning, might call her with a jerk to prayers at the Cathedral. As this explained the clothes-line, and there was not much else in the line of clothes before them, the discomfited and blushing Police beat a hasty retreat.

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, August 13th, 1864.

IT is nearly the middle of August, and it seems but yesterday that May came tripping over the threshold of the year. How rapidly these springs and summers come and go. I wonder where they all drift to? Where are the lost Junes staying? Are these mellow Augusts gathered up anywhere like the apples that ripen with autumn's approach?

The worst of it is, that these months beckon us to follow them as they vanish: I wouldn't mind pinning my fortunes to their retreating robes, but then it would be pleasant to know where one was going to. Tell me where the party is to be and who is to be at it, and I'll be there even without a formal invitation, a June on one arm and an August on the other—dancing girls both of them—June wearing a wreath of green grain and grasses, and August with fire-flies in her hair. But I'd scarcely care to meet all the Junes and Augusts that have gone before—the pale dead loves that we have danced and been merry with, but true to never. They would remind us of resolves unfulfilled and vows forgotten, of all we swore to do but left unaccomplished, of all we might have done had performance kept faith with promise. There are days in our past lives, of course, that we'd like to meet with again and to dwell with forever, but they are sadly in the minority. It is best to leave graves alone, for if we could summon shadows from them the ghosts of those we hate and fear would so far outnumber the spirits of those we loved that we'd gladly see the whole crew laid.

Looking back over my life, its happiest and decidedly its most innocent hours, the ones that have left me the least cause for regret and the fewest occasions for tears, are those I passed in sleep.

There are few men I apprehend that can contemplate their past lives with that calm and satisfaction which must have filled the bosom of Rip Van Winkle when he laid his trembling head upon its last pillow.

If parents were as wise in their generation as they should be, they'd never wake their children until Nature rang lively bells in their quickening ears, and early breakfasts would become unknown in families.

Early rising is a practice based not so much upon the example of the lark as upon the reprehensible habit of the goose. The lark is warm and snug in its nest, dreaming of speckled eggs hidden where the eye of no truant boy can find them, while the other fowl is standing upon one leg in the early morning damps, looking as cold and uncomfortable as can be. The lark is a sensible bird, and never runs the risk of catching cold by standing with its feet in the wet grasses. Immediately on getting up it flies to the most convenient fence and goes to sleep again. As to the idea that the early bird catches the worm, that is one of those popular fallacies which originated in an ignorant age, to be perpetuated under the guise of a proverb even to the present day of enlightenment. The fact of the matter is, the early bird doesn't catch anything but a cold. The worm never wriggles out of his hole before noon, and the smartest and earliest bird that ever was known can't bring him to the scratch before that time. The worm is a practical house-keeper—keeping himself in his house as long as possible—and he has a deal to do in the way of getting breakfast before stirring out of mornings. The bird that brings him out of bed before he gets ready must have an extremely long bill—and even then it is better presented after dew.

When the fires of youth warmed my blood, I have several times committed the mistake of getting up early in the morning to go gunning. But I never got any game by it. The only birds that were up that early were up trees. Experience demonstrated to me that the best way to get squirrels was to go out in the middle of the day, sit down under a tree and pretend not to be looking for them. They were sure to come and chirrup all around you. Later in life I found that girls could be caught in the same way. Laziness is very often a better policy than honesty. Sit under a tree, for instance, and cherries will probably drop in your mouth—climb for them, and the chances are that you break your neck.

Is it right to wake children early, and cheat them of such delicious dreams as a little fellow relates in a charming poem called

GRANDPAPALITTLEBOY?

Last night, when I was in my bed,
  Such fun it seemed to me;
I dreamt that I was grandpapa,
  And grandpapa was me.

I thought I wore a powdered wig,
  Drab shorts, and gaiters buff,
And took, without a single sneeze,
  A double pinch of snuff.

But he was such a tiny boy,
  And dressed in baby-clothes;
And I thought I smacked his face, because
  He wouldn't blow his nose.

And I went walking up the street,
  And he ran by my side;
But because I walked too quick for him,
  My goodness, how he cried!

And after tea I washed his face,
  And when his prayers were said,
I blew the candle out, and left
  Poor grandpapa in bed.

A BAY VIEW OF THE MATTER.

If there be anything in life that I would get up early for, it certainly is a morning drive to Bay View Park, and a breakfast there.

I tried it the other morning in accordance with a previous engagement with some friends. At six o'clock precisely there were knocks at my door—it was John.

"Get up, sir; it's past six!"

"What business of yours if it is? What are you rattling around here for? Go away from that door!"

"But there's a team down stairs, and a party of gentlemen and ladies in it, and they sent me up with a cocktail to bring you down."

"Ah, circumstances alter cases—even objective ones; set the cocktail down, and say I'll be down soon."

Let me here remark, that if any one supposes that any conversation like the above actually took place, that one is egregiously fooled. People don't carry on spirited conversations in that style with the stranger who is outside their gates at six in the morning, when all one's ideas are naturally at sixes and sevens. But dialogue is the life of narrative, and all story-tellers contrive to put it in. All the rest, however, may be relied upon as a true tale—id est, a true cocktail.

A dash of cold water in the face and eyes, a duet on the head with a pair of brushes—and I was dressed. Of course, other clothes were called into play to make the toilet complete, but minuteness of detail seriously interferes with the spiritedness of a story.

Down at the door was one of Brewster's buggies and a pair of bays from the stable of Porter—what more need be said? We chose bays, by the way, because we were going out to Bay View, and it was necessary to preserve the unities. A crack of the whip and we were off. The early birds about town—gutter-snipes, these are, mainly—thought we were an extra express train on a railroad they hadn't heard of before. Bay View isn't very far from town when you are behind one of Porter's teams. Precisely how far it is I do not now remember, though we were tolled twice going out there. At a rough guess I should say it is about a mile and a half or more. The distance will be shortened by a road which is now being built out to the track—a shell road, though a half-shell one would answer the purpose quite as well and be more in keeping with those who travel on it.

At Bay View we found one of the nicest hotels in the country, and Billy Williamson—so called from the fact that he is old William's son. Sometimes people call him Willy Billyson, for short—this they do, principally, when they start to go away, and nobody notices the difference.

The ladies retired to make themselves bright and beautiful for breakfast. There was no need for me to waste any time that way—I'm always bright and beautiful. The balance of the party went around with the proprietor to see how the house was furnished. Judging by their looks when they returned, I should say it was plentifully furnished with bottles.

Ah, what a morning that was! The air was as soft as a girl's cheek, balmy as a woman's breath. Sitting out there on the balcony it played with your pulses until your body seemed a lute, wantoned with your hair, and made love to you all the while. It is appetizing, too, as bitters. What a breakfast we had! Melons that knew for the first time how good it was to be pulled and eaten; peaches that one might have sworn had ripened in Spain, and grapes that had sunshine in the purple of their blood. The fruit, too, of that vine which encumbereth the ground, was there. Hockheimer that fairly laughed with its memories of the Rhine; champagne bright with the sparkle and foam of its vineyards; mountain trout of whose brook-life one might write—fin-is; tender pullets whose brief career on earth had ended in a broil; but it is easier to tell what we had not for breakfast than to count over like beads what we had. So with the remark that we had no eels, no fried liver, nothing else that is dirty and indigestible, we'll make a break from the breakfast table.

It was fun to sit out on the balcony, with coffee, cigars and ladies who didn't object to smoking, and see the race-horses speeded round the track. That track, be it understood, is one of the finest in the world. It is level as a threshing floor and firm as granite, but possessed of sufficient elasticity to spare the horses' feet. In short, it is in keeping with the stables and the house, which are all marvels of elegance, adaptability and good sense. The hotel is furnished throughout like a private house, and all it requires to make people believe that it is one is a piano or two more and a baby.

There is a fine opportunity for a walk on the sea-beach if disposed. Here everything goes on swimmingly. The Scriptural description of the good time coming is realized, and the sea-lion and the clam may be seen lying down together. The sportive clam is a great favorite with me. I like to watch him clambering over the beach, or sitting in the bosom of his family at nightfall, seldom lifting up his voice, but graceful in pantomime and easy to be understewed. Slow in his movements, he is always very sure—to tell the story in a single sentence: I like clams.

Leaving the beach and the Bay View, we drive into town, contriving to stop at the Willows. This is the bower where dwells that—

> Singular bird, with a manner absurd,
> Which they call the Australian Emen.

Bret hung his harp on the Willows some three months since, and sang a plaintive ornithological ballad of which the Emen was the theme. Certainly it was a most emeusing rhyme. With his usual luck, the ballad was copied at the East and the credit given to some one else. But poets must expect this fate. Posterity does them that justice which printers and proof-readers refuse them.

The Willows were burned down some time last fall. Like the Phœnix, they have arisen green from their ashes. A better house than ever is on the ground, thoroughly well furnished and excellently appointed throughout. The grounds have been trimmed and beautified until one has no grounds for complaint. There are shuffle-boards, ten-pin alleys, shooting galleries, and everything else that makes life comfortable. The only fault with the shooting galleries is that they don't put up the right kind of birds. They have spring chickens that spring up the moment the gun is fired and allow the ball to pass under them as harmlessly as though it were an egg. Besides, they are too small to hit conveniently, after breakfasting at the Bay View. We fired at one chicken the other day ten times, though I am confident that I could have hit the emeu every time at half the distance. Under certain conditions a double-barrel shotgun, or something else that will scatter, should be furnished by the proprietor of these shooting galleries of art to his patrons. For my part I prefer a brickbat to a rifle any day, so far as accuracy of aim is concerned, though it doesn't carry quite so well. A smooth-bore—especially those terrible smooth bores that are so common in society—I never could abide.

Was it the daughters of Jerusalem or of Babylon that sat down by the Willows and wept? Certain it is that many daughters of Jerusalem may be seen out at these Willows, though they don't weep much; and as for the other daughters, those of Babble on—were ever a dozen daughters gathered together that didn't?

But farewell to the Willows—long may they wave, and never may the proprietor waive his present rule of making his guests comfortable. As for the other place, go out and see Willy Billyson, otherwise known as the Old War Horse, and if you are not satisfied with a Bay View of life, say you have been swindled by

INIGO.

NOTHINGS.

MY friend INIGO writes "Things:" he deals in facts; his attention is fixed on the material side of life; whereas I am a spiritual individual; I deal in airy nonsensities; I write "Nothings." Like Goethe:

> I've set my heart upon nothing, you see;
> Hurrah!
> And so the world goes well with me:
> Hurrah!
> And who has a mind to be fellow of mine,
> Why, let him take hold and help me drain
> These mouldy lees of wine.
> * * * * * * * *
> Now, I've set my heart upon nothing, you see;
> Hurrah!
> And the whole wide world belongs to me.
> Hurrah!
> The feast begins to run low, no doubt;
> But at the old cask we'll have one bout:
> Come, drink the lees all out!

BLESSED IS HE WHO EXPECTS NOTHING.

He who reads me and expects nothing will not be disappointed. My philosophy is suited to the times. They who hope for anything shall suffer humiliation. Blessed are they who have nothing: they shall not lose it. Blessed are they who have no feet: they shall not go lame because of the tumble in Gould and Curry. Blessed are they who have no farms; they have not had the vain expense of putting in crops. Blessed are they who have no brick buildings: their houses can defy the earthquakes. Blessed are they who have no ships: they shall not be taken by the pirates. Blessed are they who have no brains; they shall not be troubled by the "malady of thought."

LAMENT FOR THE GOLDEN AGE AS KNOWN IN HISTORY.

I am in favor of bringing back the happy time when a man was either poor or rich; when everybody knew his place; when the fate of a man was settled by his birth; when the nobles had the means of keeping up appearances; and when common people had no appearances to keep up. That was a happy age. Humility was a virtue which the great mass of the people could practice in those days without an effort. A hero was a man who had a suit of arrow-proof armor; a saint was a chap who prayed all night and starved himself all day. Heroism and saintship were to be acquired then by simple means. People were not miserable then for the want of point-lace, champagne, and cashmere shawls. Doubts in religion, popular rights in politics, hoops in the dresses of common women, and strychnine in whisky did not then interfere with the happiness of mankind. All that is changed, and such a change! Alas! that I have fallen on such degenerate times.

A SERMON ON CHEERFULNESS.

I lately read a sermon on the duty of cheerfulness. It was written by a bachelor clergyman who had a sensational style, an abundant flow of words, an excellent memory for high-sounding periods, good elocution, a rich and fashionable congregation, a high salary, and a circle of three dozen admiring ladies, each of whom considered him as her prize. The duty of cheerfulness, amidst fine linen, broad-cloth, diamond shirt-studs, gold sleeve-buttons, roast turkey, sparkling champagne, and devoted young ladies every day, and a whole library of printed sermons ready to be rehashed for Sunday.

SYMPATHY WITH THE UNFORTUNATE.

It is a very pleasant duty to be cheerful under these circumstances; but there are other cases in which it is not so easy to be cheerful. Consider the fate of the poor, not only without money but without friends, excluded because of their poverty from pleasant society which they could appreciate and enjoy, sneered at for their old or torn clothes, compelled to seek new employment frequently, refused with disdain when they seek, subjected to insult by their employer when they obtain it, forced to submit to abatements in the prices agreed upon, humiliated every day by some person who happens to have a little more money, stinted in the present and hopeless for the future. My sympathies are with them, and even when they commit crime. While I consent that society should protect its conventional rules, I consent with pity; and I long to see the times when all this will be changed.

HUMAN PERFECTIBILITY.

Humanity has at last entered finally upon a wonderful career of progress, and obtained a headway which is irresistible and a speed so great, that we are now making more progress within a decennium than was made two hundred years ago in a century. The barbarians will never crush out a glorious civilization. Enlightenment is now accompanied by power. Art is not confined, as in the day of Pericles to oratory, painting and sculpture, but has gone into the workshop. It makes our revolvers, gunpowder, gun-cotton, Sharp's rifles, Armstrong guns, iron-clad ships and telescopic sights. It guides the rifle bullet to a man's heart, at a distance of half a mile; it enables the engineer to drop a shell into a house three miles distant at the third shot. The genius, the intelligence, the learning, the political wisdom, the military experience, the wealth, and the art-treasures of the whole world are not now confined within the narrow walls of Athens or Rome, but they have been scattered over vast continents; and a thousand towns now have resources such as the Eternal City had not in her palmiest days. Rome might sink and religion would still live; France might be swallowed up and civilization would not stop in its progress; philosophy would survive the sudden and simultaneous death of all the Germans; English liberty and law would still exist though England should disappear. The downfall of Athens and Rome shall never again be repeated. Cities may be destroyed, but the seeds of progress are scattered too wide and planted in soil too fertile to be ever again uprooted and destroyed. The theory of the perfectibility of man, set forth with hesitation and doubt during the French Revolution, is now the universal creed; that is, we perceive clearly that while man never will be perfect, he must continue, while the race exists, to advance nearer and nearer to perfection.

KEINMANN.

THE Battle Hymn, written by Julia Ward Howe, to the air of the famous John Brown song, and having for its refrain, "For God is marching on," is nationally known. Its beauty is only equalled by the extravagance of the sentiment which it embodies. But we scarcely think it has been improved upon in a Fremont Campaign Song which the New Nation publishes, and of which the following is the concluding stanza:

> When loudly peal the chorus till the welkin rings once more,
> Till we hear the echoes sounding from the far Pacific shore,
> And raise on high the banner that our fathers proudly bore,
> For Fremont is marching on!
> Chorus—Oh, Glory! Hallelujah!
> Fremont is marching on.

Setting aside the perhaps unimportant fact that "the echoes sounding from the far Pacific shore," have not in the main been of a nature to prove eminently gratifying to either the candidate or his friends, we do not think that the substitution of Fremont's name for that of God in the anthem, is an improvement. Nor do we see what "Glory Hallelujah" has to do with the announcement that Fremont is marching on. If he were marching off, the case might be different; but certainly as it at present stands we do not at all see the connection. There is a flavor of impiety, not to say blasphemy, about the parody. To shout Fremont in the name of the prophet would perhaps be tolerated in countries where figs are similarly cried, but here it is sadly out of place. And in any event we do not very clearly see where the "Glory Hallelujah" comes in.

"Go from home to hear news, always." The eastern papers inform us that a soft-soap mine has been discovered in California. We don't doubt it; the thing abounds here as well as elsewhere, and rich leads of it may be struck all over the country. But we don't believe that any of them would pay the working. As a general rule, soft-soap won't wash; too much lye enters into its composition. California has no need to be proud of her wealth in that particular.

An Indian hatchet has been found in New Brunswick, embedded in an oak. Examination disclosed that it must have been struck there when the tree was young and that it had remained there over two centuries, as more than two hundred years' growth of the tree was counted outside where the hatchet lay. Henceforth there will probably be no difficulty in localizing the precise place where the Indians "buried the hatchet."

HE can well bear the revolutions of the envious seasons who bears eternal summer in his soul.

TAR AND FEATHERS.

TAR and Feathers! The two substances have nothing in common; they are, in fact, not friends, but enemies, for on being brought into contact they mutually destroy each other's usefulness, yet do they cling together with a tenacity of affection which renders them thenceforth inseparable. It is impossible to say whose was the master-mind which first conceived the brilliant idea of their combined, or rather successive, application to the human form as a mode of punishment, that, to a large amount of bodily suffering, adds the extremes of ridicule and disgrace. The first trace of what has latterly been somewhat grandiloquently named the Plumeopican code of laws is to be found nearly seven hundred years ago. When Richard Cœur de Lion, in the year 1190, went to the Crusades with Philip Augnstus of France, his army joined that of his royal ally at Vezelai according to agreement. The two armies did not remain long together, in consequence of the numerous quarrels that arose, and the French King went away with his men to the Holy Land, leaving Richard to follow. While at Chinon, a small town in the province of Touraine, Richard issued divers orders for the better regulation of his soldiers during their voyage on the Mediterranean. Among these orders was the following remarkable one:

"Latro autem de furto convictus tondeatur ad modum campionis, et pix bulliens super caput ejus effundatur, et pluma pulvinaris super caput ejus executiatur ad cognoscendum eum, et in prima terra qua naves applicuerint projiciatur."

This singular piece of Latin may be freely translated as follows:—The convicted thief, after having his hair clipped close after the fashion of a prize-fighter, shall first have boiling pitch ponred upon his head, and then have bed feathers shaken out over it, as a mark to know him by; and that in this condition he shall be set ashore on the first land where the ships shall touch.

Whether this punishment was ever inflicted, or whether the dread of it kept all our English Crusaders honest, is more than we ean say. Who knows but the curious traveller in search of old legends may yet find, among the inhabitants of some coast town or island in the Mediterranean, a tradition, distorted and garbled by centuries of repetition, of the sudden appearance among their forefathers of a strange bird, which discoursed in an unknown tongue, and whose body was that of a man, albeit its head was covered with downy feathers.

King Richard's Plumeopecian enactment does not seem to have met with much favor in England, as it found no place in our statute-book. It was apparently purely nautical, and did not apply to his army while on dry land. If any trace of it still exists, we should naturally expect to find it among sailors. It is not impossible that the mystic and unpleasant ceremony which accompanies the visit of Great Neptune to ships crossing the Equator, is, in fact, a faint shadow of the "pix bnlliens," if not of the "pluma pulvinaris," of Cœur de Lion. My supposition as to the nautical origin and character of tarring and feathering is singularly confirmed by the circumstance that the first recorded outrage of this kind was perpetrated by a body of sailors. It is a long stride from the Crusades of the twelfth century to onr North American colonies in the eighteenth; but nevertheless we must make it. On the 1st of November, 1773, the inhabitants of Pownalborough, a small New England town, were aroused by a loud cheering in the streets, and on going to investigate the cause, they saw "about thirty sailors surrounding an object which had more the appearance of the devil than any human beiug." The diabolical figure was a Mr. John Malcolm, a revenue officer, who had incurred the hatred of the sailors, as everybody else with whom he was brought officially into contact, by an undue severity in the exercise of the power with which he was invested. He had been taken from a Mr. Bradbury's house, where he was staying, after a stout resistance, and "being disarmed of sword, cane, hat and wig, he was genteelly tarred and feathered;" his tormentors then marched him through the streets, and let him go.

An odd feature in Mr. Malcolm's case is this—in less than three months he was tarred and feathered again! On the 25th of January, 1774, he was bullying a small boy in Fore street, Boston, when a gentleman named Hughes remonstrated with him; high words arose, they called each other rascals. "Anyhow," says Hughes, "I was never tarred and feathered." Whereupon Malcolm struck him a blow on the forehead, which stretched him on the ground in an insensible condition. A mob assembled round Malcolm's house; he was foolish enough to defy them. "You say," he shouted, "I was tarred and feathered, and that it was not done in a proper manner; damn you, let me see the man that can do it better; I want to see it done in the new-fashioned manner." (This would seem to indicate that some change had been introduced into the practice.) The mob seized him, put him in a cart, and, stripping him "to buff and breeches, gave him a modern jacket;" they then proposed an oath to him, whereby he was to swear to renounce his commission, and never to hold another inconsistent with the liberties of his country; and, on his obstinately refusing, they earted him to the gallows, passed a rope round his neck, and threw the other end over the beam, as if they intended to hang him. He still defied his persecutors, until a sound basting with a rope's end, [they use cowhide now-a-days] followed by a threat to cut off his ears, forced him to comply with their demand. The mob destroyed his house and furniture, but he escaped on board the Active, a British man-of-war, which brought him to England. It is said that the well-disposed part of the people of Boston offered him £300 as compensation for his sufferings and loss, but I am inclined to doubt this.

In 1773 our North American colonies were in a ferment, and determined to resist by force the importation of the East India Company's tea from England. The ladies entered warmly into the scheme, and in one place no less than fifty-seven of them had a meeting, and agreed not to use any more India tea. They requested a gentleman who had lately bought some to return it; and, on his ready compliance, they treated him to a "glass of their country wine, and dismissed him highly pleased." Happy man! such politeness deserved its reward. All the men were not so polite, and some even went so far as to ridicule the proceedings of these ladies, styling them the Matrons of Liberty, and representing them as being secretly most anxious to have their accustomed tea, and complaining bitterly that their husbands had deprived them of it, while still retaining their own flip and punch. Probably the men required the flip and punch to rouse them to the requisite pitch for carrying out the rough measures which they now began to adopt. An inflammatory handbill was distributed in Philadelphia, calling upon the Delaware pilots to prevent the arrival of a ship laden with tea, which was expected at that port, and reminding them that she could not come to an anchor without their assistance. This was only the forerunner of more decisive measures, the fitful gust of wind that preceded the coming gale. Bodies of men were leagued together and, adopting the disguise of Indians, called themselves "Mohawks." They circulated notices, promising any one who should presume to let his store for the reception of the tea—which they described allegorically as infernal chains and fetters forged by Great Britain to enslave them—that they should not fail to pay him an unwelcome visit, in which he should be treated as he deserved by "the Mohawks." At Boston, in December 1773, these Mohawks took 342 chests of tea, valued at £18,000, and threw them into the sea. The act of the thirty sailors at Pownalborough fell into the soil thus prepared for its reception like seed, which quickly germinated and bore abundant fruit. The Mohawks now appear to have added to their destruction of property, personal violence to individuals; for, threatening notices began to be posted up in conspicuous places, signed "Joyce, jun., Chairman of the Committee for Tarring and Feathering."

Why the name of Joyce was selected as the nom de guerre of the leader of these rioters, I have been unable to discover. Perhaps there was, or had been, a "Joyce, sen.," celebrated for a rigid administration of the laws; or perhaps "Joyce's Grand American Balsam," much celebrated at that time as a panacea, may have determined the choice of the name. Fictitious signatures of the whole committee were now and then appended, such as Thomas Tarbucket, Peter Pitch, Abraham Wildfowl, David Plaister, Benjamin Brush, Oliver Scarecrow, and Henry Handcart; these, however, speak for themselves.

On the 10th of December, 1773, the committee addressed a letter to Captain Ayres of the ship Polly, which had a cargo of tea, advising him to preserve his person from the pitch and feathers that were prepared for him if he brought his ship to an anchor.

"What think you, Captain," he is asked with grim facetiousness, "of a halter round your neck, ten gallons of liquid tar decanted on your pate, and the feathers of a dozen wild geese laid over that to enliven your appearance? Dear Captain Ayres, let us advise you to fly without the wild-geese feathers."

These warnings of King Mob had their due influence on the captain. He attended "a most respectable and numerous meeting" to receive its wishes, and was so much impressed thereby that he bowed to its decision, and the ship Polly, with the tea undisturbed on board, turned her bows towards England. It was not unnatural that, since tea was entirely removed from the market, the shopkeepers should raise the price of coffee. The committee, however, was on the alert; it was not to be tolerated that coffee should be increased in price two or three pence per pound; and public notice was given that the question had been mooted, whether tar and feathers would not be a constitutional encouragement for such eminent patriotism.

About this time a brig laden with tea, commanded by a Captain Loring, was wrecked off Cape Cod; some of the cargo was saved, and was conveyed by a schooner to Castle William. Mr. George Rickford, the skipper of the latter vessel, seems to have taken a fancy to be inoculated, and went on his arrival to the hospital at Marblehead, where he was duly operated upon, and laid up to await the result. Dread of infection, however did not deter a party of Mohawks from paying him a visit, although they deferred proceeding to extremities in the then condition of his health. It is not unlikely that this visit drew the attention of the populace to this hospital for inoculation, and actuated, as is supposed, by a dread of the small-pox from patients not conforming to the rules, they commenced a series of outrages. Probably the real outrage was this, that the minds of the American mob had now become thoroughly imbued with a love of tarring and feathering their fellow-men on the smallest provocation, and here was an opportunity not to be resisted. The patients going from the ships to the hospital were obliged to find a different landing-place; the hospital boat was burnt, and several persons tarred and feathered for no particular reason. Four men were suspected of a design, under cover of the darkness, to steal some clothing belonging to the hospital, which was usually spread out to air at a particular spot. If they succeeded in their attempt, the infection would probably be communicated to the inhabitants of the neighborhood. They were watched, pursued, and taken; but, finding that they were followed, they managed to throw the clothes overboard. The four prisoners were secured until the next day, when a considerable body of the Mobility assembled, and determined by a large majority that their punishment should be—tar and feathers. The scene which followed is described by an eye-witness as "the most extraordinary exhibition of the kind ever seen in North America." The four objects of resentment were placed in a cart facing each other, having been previously tarred and feathered "in the modern way." It was estimated that at least a thousand people, chiefly dressed in uniform, among whom were four drummers, formed themselves into a procession at the town-house in Marblehead. At the heels of this multitude came the cart with its miserable occupants—a fifer and drummer walking in front of it. In this manner they marched from Marblehead to Salem, a distance of four miles and a half, entering the latter town about noon. Here a numerous body of the Salemites joined them and paraded with them through the principal streets, with drumming and fifing, and a large white flag flying from the cart, "which, with the exquisitely droll and grotesque appearance of the four tarred and feathered objects of derision, exhibited a very laughable and truly comic scene." The procession left Salem at one o'clock, and returned to Marblehead, where it dispersed. After tarring and feathering several other unfortunates, for reasons best known to themselves, the rioters, or some persons instigated by them, set fire to the hospital and burnt it, with its seventy beds, bedding, etc., to the ground.

A feeble and futile effort was now made to enforce the law and bring the culprits to punishment. With this object two or three persons were taken up on suspicion, and committed to Salem jail. A mob of some five hundred people assembled, broke into the prison, obliged the keeper ro deliver up the keys, and released the prisoners. The high-sheriff afterwards took the matter up, and summoned the inhabitants according to law, to assist him with arms and ammunition in re-taking the prisoners; but some gentle persuasion being brought to bear upon the owners of the hospital (which was private property), they were induced to withdraw all further claim for damages; and so the matter ended.

From such expressions as "modern jacket," "new-fashioned dress of tar and feathers," and many others which frequently occur in the newspaper reports of that period, it is evident that it was regarded as novelty. It has now become a settled institution, and its occurrence is no longer so unusual as to call for any remark. At that time, however, the new fashion became a complete mania, and it seems exactly to have supplied a want among the rough colonists of North America. From the numerous cases which occurred I will select a few of the most interesting. It is but seldom that any pity is expressed for the unhappy victims; and when it is, we have some difficulty in deciding whether the writer is in earnest. For instance, the Georgia papers, in giving an account of the tarring and feathering of Mr. Brown, a merchant, at Augusta, add—"the poor gentleman was a long time under their discipline, and suffered greatly."

In 1775, a shopkeeper named Laughton Martin and his servant were subjected to "the discipline." Their offence was a serious one, and is a proof—if one were wanting—that freedom of opinion and speech was not less difficult of enjoyment in the Home of Liberty ninety years ago, than it is now. Master and man, in a reckless moment, had drunk "D———n to the American cause!" Having been indued with the Plumeopicean robe, they were conducted in a cart to the water-side, and put on board a ship bound to Bristol, without being suffered to see either wife or family; but not without being first taken to a tavern, where the committee was sitting, and obliged to drink a counter-toast. In August of the same year, Mr. Antony Warrsick, a most respectable merchant of Virginia, was unguarded enough to say to some idle people, who were abusing king and parliament, "You are lawless fellows." He was instantly seized, carried about fifteen miles, when he was stripped entirely naked, tied to a public whipping-post, and then and there tarred and feathered. After loading him with every species of scurrilous abuse their minds could invent, his tormentors released him. That the law was utterly powerless is evident, for, the persons of those empowered to administer it were not safe from attack. In September, 1775, James Smith, Esq., a judge of the Court of Common Pleas for Duchess county, New York, and Cohen Smith (his brother or near relative, as I suppose), were carted five or six miles into the country, and "very handsomely tarred and feathered," for acting in open contempt of the resolves of the County Committee.

I have hitherto dealt only with that branch of my subject which shows how tarring and feathering was developed in opposition to British rule in North America. Some twenty years later it was employed with even greater vigor against the newly-founded Government of the United States by its own citizens. If the populace objected to our attempted imposition of tea-duties, it objected more strongly to the excise on home-distilled spirits imposed by its own Government. In 1791, Congress passed a law laying duties on spirits distilled in the United States, and immediately an insurrection in opposition to this law commenced in the four most western counties of Pennsylvania, viz: Alleghany, Washington, Fayette, and Westmoreland. Of these counties, Washington, in spite of the name it bore, uniformly distinguished its resistance by greater excesses than the other counties, and seems to have been chiefly instrumental in kindling and keeping alive the flame. In his speech to Congress, November 19, 1794, Gen. Washington had to allude to this insurrection, which had only been suppressed that year, and when he had to name the particular counties which had revolted, it was remarked that he faltered, and his voice trembled as he uttered the names of Washington and Fayette. The amount of tar and feathers employed in this insurrection must have been startling; and, when we consider how thinly peopled the district must have been at that time, a man who had not undergone "the discipline" was doubtless quite a rarity.

Of course, the vengeance of the mob fell first on those who had been bold enough to take the posts of collectors of revenue. Washington county led the way. On the 6th of September, 1791, Mr. Robert Johnson, who had accepted the office of Collector of Revenue for Washington and Alleghany counties, was waylaid at a place on Pigeon Creek, by a party of men, armed and disguised; they tied him naked to a tree, cut off his hair, tarred and feathered him, and deprived him of his horse, thus obliging him to travel a considerable distance on foot in that mortifying and ridiculous plight. The authorities gave orders for the arrest of three of the men concerned in this outrage, and directed Mr. Clement Biddle, the United States Marshal, to serve the necessary processes. Mr. Biddle entrusted this dangerous duty to his deputy, one Joseph Fox, who in his turn, thinking discretion the better part of valor, sent them by private messenger, under cover. The Marshal did not hesitate to express his conviction that if he had attempted to serve these notices himself, he should not have been allowed to return alive. As it was, the unfortunate messenger was caught, whipped, tarred and feathered and, after having had his money and horse taken from him, was blindfolded, and tied to a tree in the woods, in which condition he remained for five hours. Another official, named Welles, who had accepted the post of collector for the counties of Westmoreland and Fayette, was similarly ill-treated.

Some time in October in the same year, an unhappy man of weak intellect, Wilson by name, a stranger in the country, became possessed with an idea that he was a collector, or in some way invested with official functions in relation to the excise. He went about inquiring of the distillers if they had registered their stills according to law. His imaginary official dignity was but short-lived; he was pursued by a party of insurgents, as usual, in disguise, and taken out of his bed. They carried him about three miles to a blacksmith's shop, stripped him naked and burned his clothes. After applying a red-hot iron to various parts of his body, they tarred and feathered him, and dismissed him at daybreak, naked, wounded, and otherwise in a very suffering condition. The wretched lunatic bore the torture inflicted upon him, with the heroic fortitude of a man who believed himself to be a martyr to the discharge of some important duty. A similar fate befel a man named Roseberry, and several others.

In August, 1792, the Inspector of Revenue procured the house of Captain W. Faulkner for an office in Washington county; but the all-powerful mob threatened the captain that, if he did not prevent the further use of his house as an office, they would scalp, tar and feather him, and burn his house and property. It is needless to enquire whether he acquiesced in their demands. In 1793, the condition of affairs remained the same. Some distillers were disposed to comply with the orders of the Government, but they were subject to "the discipline," and—in one case at least—compelled to advertise their sufferings in the Pittsburg Gazette, as a warning to others. One of the many sufferers in this riotous opposition to the law, was a private person, who had innocently remarked, that, when people did not obey government, they could not look for its protection! As late as the 6th of June, 1794, John Lynn, whose house was occupied as an excise office, underwent the usual formula, viz: he was tarred, feathered, tied to a tree, &c., added to which, his house was partly destroyed. About this time the United States Marshal seems to have ventured within the riotous districts; but his mission was productive of no results, save danger and disgrace to himself. He was fired upon, and eventually seized. His life was frequently threatened; in fact he was probably only saved by the intervention of some of the leading insurgents, who possessed either more humanity or prudence than their fellows. His safety and liberty were alone secured to him, by his entering into a solemn engagement to serve no more processes on the western side of the Alleghany Mountains.

One of the last acts of the insurgents was the stoppage of the mail from Pittsburg to Philadelphia by armed men, who cut open the bag, and, from the letters that it contained, found out which of the inhabitants were enemies to the popular cause. Delegates were dispatched from the town of Washington to Pittsburg, to demand the expulsion of these secret foes. A prompt obedience was unavoidable. The government could temporize no longer. Affidavits and reports of the facts were presented to President Washington, who, by the unanimous advice of his cabinet, decided to call out the militia,—a measure which was not accomplished without difficulty. The rebellion instantly collapsed; and it is not clear that the force called out to suppress the insurrection did not do more mischief than the insurgents themselves. Marshall, in his life of Washington, says—"The greatness of the force prevented the effusion of blood; the disaffected did not venture to assemble in arms."

These riotous proceedings of the mob, this defiance of the constituted authorities, must in no way be confounded with what is called Lynch-law. This is a much more solemn and important affair, which, though open to great abuse, has nevertheless done good service in newly occupied terrrtories, where the arm of the law, properly so called, is powerless to punish or protect; or where, as in some cases, the populace take upon themselves that leniency towards crime which is so characteristic of American legislation. Judge Lynch and his subordinates employ tar and feathers very freely as a punishment, but they are usually only mild adjuncts to far more terrible measures.

In the life and practice of the Hindoos there is a disposition to renounce the world and mortify the body, which, far surpassing the rigorous self-denial of the early Christian anchorites in Egypt, is carried to an intensity and extreme which is almost incredible that human nature should be capable of.—F. W. Schlegel.

Never, never do violence to your own rational nature. He who in any case admits doctrines which contradict reason has broken down the great barrier between truth and falsehood and lays open his mind to every delusion. The great mark o error, which is inconsistency, ceases to shock him. He has violated the first law of the intellect and must pay the fearful penalty.—Channing's Self-Denial.

The sublime attainments which man has been capable of making in science, and the wonders of his own creative art in that magnificent scene to which he has known how to give new magnificence, have been considered by many as themselves proofs of the immortality of a being so highly endowed. When we view him, indeed, comprehending in his single conception, the events of ages which have preceded him, and not content with the past, anticipating events that are to begin only in ages as remote in futurity as the origin of the universe is in the past, measuring the distance of the remotest planets, and naming in what year of other centuries the nations that are now gazing with astonishment upon some comet, are to gaze on it in its return, it is scarcely possible for us to believe that a mind which seems equally capacious of what is infinite in space and time, should only be a creature whose brief existence is measurable by a few points of space, and a few moments of eternity.—Brown's Moral Philosophy, Sec. 97.

One striking peculiarity of Jesus is the extent, the vastness of his views. Whilst all around him looked for a Messiah to liberate God's ancient people—whilst to every other Jew, Judea was the exclusive object of pride and hope, Jesus came declaring himself to be the deliverer and light of the world, and in his whole teaching and life you see a consciousness which never forsakes him, of a relation to the whole human race. This idea of blessing mankind, of spreading a universal religion, was the most magnificent which had ever entered man's mind. All previous religions had been given to particular nations. No conqueror, legislator, philosopher, in the extravagance of ambition. had ever dreamed of subjecting all nations to a common faith.—Channing—Evidences of Revealed Religion.

Those wild tribes [of Northern Barbarians, who overran the Roman Empire soon after the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Government] were bringing with them into the magic circle of the Western Church's influence the very materials which she required for the building up of a future Christendom, and which she could as little find in the Western Empire as in the Eastern, [both of which were then Christian while the Barbarian were Pagan]; comparative purity of morals, sacred respect for woman, for family life, for law, equal justice, individual freedom, and above all, for honesty in word and deed.—Kingsley—Preface to Hypatia.

If people were educated, though not comprehending the science employed, they could comprehend that what they saw [in mechanical contrivances] was purely a matter of science, and that the cause and effect were natural and definite; unlike the present race of Egyptians, who not long since regarded the very mechanics of a European as an operation of magic; and were capable of suspecting that a machine constructed by a man from England for raising water from the Nile should innudate the country in an hour.—Foster—Evils of Popular Ignorance.

Brougham, in a speech in the House of Commons on the Irish elective franchise said: "How will the reverend Bishops of the other House be able to express their due abhorrence of the crime of perjury, who solemnly declare in the presence of God that when they are called upon to accept a living, perhaps of £4,000 a year, at that very instant, they are moved by the Holy Ghost to accept the office and administration thereof, and for no other consideration whatever." The modes of initiation are more dangerous than Custom-house oaths. The Bishop is elected by the Dean and Prebends of the Cathedral. The Queen sends these gentlemen a congé d'elire, or leave to elect; but also sends them the name of the person whom they are to elect. They go into the Cathedral, chaunt and pray, and beseech the Holy Ghost to assist them in their choice; and, after their invocations, invariably find that the dictates of the Holy Ghost agree with the recommendations of the Queen.—Emerson.

We want a religion that bears heavily, not only on the "exceeding sinfulness of sin," but on the exceeding rascality of lying and stealing—a religion that banishes short measures from the counters, small baskets from the stalls, pebbles from the cotton-bags, clay from paper, sand from sugar, chicory from coffee, otter from butter, flour from cream of tartar, beet-juice from vinegar, alum from bread, strychnine from wine, water from milk-cans, and buttons from the contribution box. The religion that is to save the world will not put all the big strawberries at the top, and all the bad ones at the bottom. It will sell raisins on stems, instead of stems without raisins. It will not offer more baskets of foreign wines than the vineyards ever produced bottles; and more barrels of Genesee flour than all the wheat-fields of New York grow, and all her mills grind. It will not make one-half of a pair of shoes of good leather, and the other of poor leather, so that the first shall redouud to the maker's credit and the second to his cash; nor, if the shoes have been promised on Thursday morning, will it let Thursday morning spin out till Saturday night. It will not put Jouvin's stamp on Jenkins' kid gloves; nor make Paris bonnets in the back room of a Boston milliner's shop; nor let a piece of velvet that professes to measure twelve yards come to an untimely end in the tenth; or a spool of sewing silk that vouches for twenty yards be nipped in the bud at fourteen and a half; nor the cotton thread spool break to the yard-stick fifty of the two hundred yards of promise that was given to the eye; nor yard-wide cloth measure less than thirty-six inches from selvage to selvage; nor all-wool delaines and all-linen handkerchiefs be amalgamated with clandestine cotton; nor water-proof cloaks be soaked through in an hour; nor coats made of old woolen rags pressed together be sold to an unsuspecting public for legal broadcloth. It does not put bricks at five dollars per thousand into chimneys which it contracted to build of seven-dollar material; nor smuggle white pine into floors that have paid for hard piuc; nor leave yawning cracks in closets where boards ought to join: nor daub ceilings that ought to be smoothly plastered; nor make window blinds with slats that cannot stand the wind, and paint that cannot stand the sun, and fastenings that may be looked at but are on no account to be touched. It does not send the little boy, who has come for the daily quart of milk, into the barn-yard to see the calf, and seize the opportunity to skim off the cream; nor does it surround stale butter with fresh, and sell the whole for good; nor pass off the slack-baked bread upon the stable boy; nor dust the pepper, nor deacon the apples. It does not put cotton gathering-threads into the skirt to succumb on the slightest provocation; nor content itself with fastening seams at the beginning and the end, trusting to Providence for the security of the intermediate stages. The religion that is to sanctify the world pays its debts. It does not borrow money with little or no prospect of repayment, but concealing or glossing over the fact. It does not consider that forty cents returned for one hundred cents given is according to Gospel, though it may be according to law. It looks upon a man who has failed in trade, and who continues to live in luxury, as a thief. It looks upon a man who promises to pay fifty dollars on demand with interest, and who neglects to pay it on demand with or without interest, as a liar.—Gail Hamilton.

FUNNY PARAGRAPHS.

Can a man, when looking over the contents of a tobacconist's shop, be said to be taking a bird's-eye view of the stock?

What peculiar phrenological development does a successful dairyman possess? The bump of adulteration.

A man wishing to sympathize with his neighbor for the loss of his wife, said: "I am sorry your poor lady has gone to heaven." "Thank you," replied the other, "may it be long before you go."

A lady once asked a gentleman what wit was like, to which he replied: "Like your ladyship's bottle of sal volatile—poignant at the first opening, but, on being too much handed about, it becomes disagreeable."

An epitaph says:

> Private John Thomes lies buried here,
> Who died from drinking cold small beer.
> Good Christian! drink no beer at all,
> Or if you will drink beer, don't drink it small.

Hancock (when signing the Declaration of Independence.) "There must be no discord or pulling different ways; we must all hang together."

Franklin.—"If we don't hang together, we shall be hanged separately."

I thank God we have not free schools nor printing [in Virginia] and I hope we shall not have these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience, and heresy, and sects into the world; and printing has divulged them and libels against the Government. God keep us from both.—Sir Wm. Berkley, Governor of Virginia, in 1671.

Smith, who was telling a very long and tedious story, was interrupted and told that he did not know all the facts. He replied that he learned the whole story from the person to whom the events occurred. "No," said the interruptor, "he did not tell you the end of it." The laugh which ensued put an end to the story.

A gentleman entertaining a few friends at dinner, gave them Madeira to drink, and then ordered his servant to open a box of Constantia and bring one bottle. This proved so good that the guests demanded another. The host refused. Sydney Smith, who was present, said: "Since we can't double the Cape, we must e'en go back to Madeira." The pun called out a laugh, and the host, seeing a chance for another pun, sacrificed a bottle to it. He said: "Be of Good Hope; you shall double it."

Newton was very absent-minded at times. On one occasion, his servant, after having been out of the house a quarter of an hour, heard his master's bell ringing violently, and going to his room, found Sir Isaac squirming in his chair very near a hot fire. Newton exclaimed, "Quick, you rascal—put out that fire; I'm all blistered!" The servant replied: "But, sir, you could have moved back from the fire." "Bless me!" replied the philosopher, "I never thought of that."

John Smith (in the first American Congress just after the Declaration of Independence.)—"Mr. President, for the more complete establishment of our independence, and to show that our separation from Great Britain is eternal, I move that the people of the United States adopt Latin as their language, and allow no English to be spoken."

Franklin.—"I move to amend, that we continue to use English, but compel the Englishmen to use Latin."

A certain Sunday-school teacher was in the habit of making a collection in his juvenile class for missionary objects. He was not a little surprised, however, one day, to find a country note among the weight of copper. He was not long in finding it to be a broken bank; and on asking the class who put it there, the donor was pointed out to him by one who had seen him deposit it. "Didn't you know that this note was good for nothing?" said the teacher. "Yes," answered the boy. "Then what did you put it in the box for?" The boy coolly replied, "I didn't s'pose the little heathens would know the difference, and thought it would be just as good for them."

Papyrius Pretextatus when a youth, was taken by his father into the Roman Senate while that body was discussing a great state secret. His mother pestered him to know what the secret was, and to pacify her he said they were considering whether it were better that a man should have two wives or that a woman should have two husbands. The lady told this to her friends, among whom it created a great excitement, and next morning the Senate House was surrounded by a mob of women crying out, "Let a woman have two husbands." The senators asked one another the meaning of the excitement, and were so much pleased when Papyrius explained it, that they passed a decree that no son of a senator, except Pretextatus, should be admitted when the senate should sit with closed doors.

Brantz Mayer, in his book, Mexico as it Was and Is, speaking of a visit to the Chapel of Loretto, a fashionable church near the City of Mexico, in March, 1842, says: "As I entered from the front door of this edifice, the first thing that attracted my notice was a side altar converted into an arbor, in the center of which was a well, with Christ and the woman of Samaria beside it. The lady had been fitted out by a most fashionable mantua-maker, in a costume of blue satin picked out with pink, and while she leaned gracefully on a silver pitcher resting on the edge of the well, our Saviour stood opposite in a mantle of purple velvet, embroidered with gold, and covered with a Guayaquil sombréro (Panama hat.)

Newton, riding across Salisbury Plain, passed a shepherd boy who said, "If you don't make haste you'll get wet." The The traveller looked at the sky, and seeing every appearance of warm, placid weather, said, "I guess not." "Yes, you will," said the boy. Newton rode on, but in about an hour he was caught by a severe thunder storm. Astonishment at the fulfillment of the confident prediction was followed by wonder whether that rude boy had discovered some great principle unknown to the most learned philosophers. In the anxious hope of making an important addition to scientific knowledge, he rode back in the rain and mud to the shepherd, whom he found in a little hut. "Boy," said Newton, "I will give you a guinea if you will tell me how you knew it was going to rain." "Agreed," said the boy; "give me the guinea." The money paid, the boy stepped out and pointing at one of his flock, said, "Whenever that old black ram turns his tail up, puts his head down, and runs against the wind, you may be certain that it will rain within two hours."

THE AMERICAN SEA DUEL.

AN action has been fought between one of the cruisers of the Federal States of America and that cruiser of the Confederate States which has probably damaged commerce more, and with more impunity, than any other ship of war that ever sailed under a pennant. The Alabama was a beautiful conjunction of the power of armament and speed, and took the lead as a new form of ship-building adapted for the molestation of commerce. The Confederates were happy in their ship, and lucky in their commander and; as a dashing officer is sure to do, Captain Semmes collected round him as fine a ship's company as ever did honor to the decks of a man-of-war. Our naval reserve, and the Excellent, gunnery ship, did something, perhaps, for the care of his ordnance; Capt. Blakely made his guns, Mr. Laird built the ship. The error into which it seems to us that Capt. Semmes fell was a supposition that the Federals would send out, for his capture or destruction, the same class of heavy-armed tubs they possessed when Mr. Laird projected the Alabama. That Capt. Semmes, as an American, should have fallen into such a mistake is strange, because he ought to have known the "go-ahead" nature of his countrymen. Capt. Semmes knew that scores of ships were hunting him, armed with Dahlgren's heavy rifled shell guns, which could, if they were allowed to get the range of the Alabama, either blow her up or send her down; there was but one of these ships for which Capt. Semmes cared, the Vanderbilt, a powerful paddle-wheel steamer, pressed into the Federal out of the merchant service. The Vanderbilt had the foot of the Alabama from her enormous steam power, but she was not man-of-war built; and although Capt. Semmes did not desire to fight with her, he reasonably considered that his two Blakely pivot guns, neither exceeding a nine-inch bore, might carry him through with success.

The Vanderbilt could not, or would not, find the Alabama. But the Federal authorities, coming to that conclusion in five minutes which would have occupied our Admiralty in deliberation for five months, determined to put their tremendous battery of eleven-inch Dahlgrens on board the partially fortified hull of a speedy ship with vast steam power. With such a ship the Alabama could only contend by choosing her distance, and that she could not choose by reason of the superior speed of her antagonist. The consequence seems to us inevitable. The heavier and the speedier ship chose her distance, and sent the weaker and slower ship to the bottom. The cause of this effect appears to us perfectly clear.

The Kearsarge was faster then the Alabama by three knots and hour, carried guns less by one in number, but of greater weight of metal, a larger crew, and withal, was partly protected in a clumsy way by iron chains. These points of superiority are quite sufficient to account for the victory after a short engagement of little more than a hour. This action is another contradiction to the prevalent opinion of naval men that sea fights will be at close quarters. The ships were never nearer than a quarter of a mile, and kept moving in circles to elude the enemy's aim, and to bring their own guns to bear on the side chosen for fighting.

The question naturally raised is why Capt. Semmes went ont to fight a duel with an enemy so much his superior. That he had misgivings of the issue is betrayed by the fact that he left his 63 watches behind him, and other valuables, the spolia opima of helpless merchantmen. If he had taken the same care of his men, some brave lives would have been spared. He says of his crew, that though they have lost their ship they have not lost their honor, nor, he might add on his own part, he his watches.

Capt. Semmes states that he did not know till after the action that his enemy was iron-clad, which, indeed, she is not, but, as we have explained, only partially protected. But he did know that his own ship was in bad order, that her bottom was foul, and consequently her speed and steering seriously impaired; but probably Capt. Semmes' easy victories over unarmed ships had encouraged a false confidence in his prowess. In proper condition the Alabama would probably have been quite as fast as the Kearsarge; but as it was, everything was against her but bravery, which seems to have been pretty equal on both sides. The two great elements of success on this occasion were speed and weight of metal. If the Alabama had been as swift as the Kearsarge she would still have felt the superiority of her enemy's heavier shot, and the inferiority of her fire ineffectual against the enemy's protected sides; but she might, even in that case, have made her escape when she found herself overmatched if she had been as fast in running away as she has been in pursuing—that is to say, if her bottom had not been foul.

The Kearsarge did not fire so many shots by half as the Alabama, but her shots all told, which was not the case with the other. It is clear that we shall soon cease to count guns, and shall weigh them instead; for it is not the number, but calibre and range that give superiority.—London Examiner, June 25.

OUR FLAG.

ITS White was made of Plymouth snows,
Where first the English Pilgrims trod—
That ice-girt Rock from whence arose
Their grateful hearts to God.

Then in a far and sunny land
Freedom's inspiring spirit glowed,
And from the South's impassioned heart
The Crimson life-stream flowed.

God saw 'twas good, and o'er its folds
A veil of heavenly Azure drew;
Bright angels came, and, wondering,
With Starry eyes looked through.

Charmed with the young world of the Free,
O'er palmy grove, o'er mountain wild,
They bore this Flag of Liberty,
While new-born angels smiled.

Its stripes can never fade or die—
By shining forms 'tis guarded yet;
And never from its holy sky
One radiant star shall set.

EMILIE LAWSON.

THE EMPRESS EUGENIE'S BARBER.

THE hair-dresser, or barber, in France, as in Italy, is generally something of a character, au fait of all the gossip of the hour, knowing everybody, and seldom inclined to underrate his knowledge or skill. He takes the tone and color of his epoch to such an extent that, could we resuscitate the professors of these kindred arts in the past, we might reconstruct the history of each period from the airs or the souveniro of its "capillary artistes."

Leonard, the hair-dresser of Marie Antoinette, wrote the memoirs of his unfortunate Queen; Plaisia, the barber of Charles X., was the favorite gossip and anecdote-monger of the Court. Mariton, who had the honor of combing and shaving the "Citizen King," was staid, practical and commercially-minded like his royal patron. Oddly enough, the Empress's hair-dresser is named Le Roy, (the King,) while the Emperor's rejoices in the name of Majeste, (Majesty.) The Master of France has no barber, he keeps to his old habit and shaves himself.

The two great reigning hair-dressers of the day are Felix and Petrus. The former has been the Empress's hair-dresser since the time of her elevation to the throne until a few months ago, when he lost his post through having weakly yielded to the seduction of an enormous bribe, allowing a lady of the Court to have a duplicate of the head-dress made for the Empress, which duplicate the lady in question vowed by all the saints in the calendar, not to let any eye behold in Paris, promising to take it off with her to the south of France that very day, instead of which she wickedly postponed her journey, and made her appearance at the Tuileries, wearing the fac-simile of the Empress's head-gear.

Though Felix, by thus violating his engagement never to let any one have a copy of anything he should invent for her Majesty until after the latter had worn it, lost his place and the handsome emoluments attached to it, he is still the first "artiste" of Paris in his own line. But he is an absolute despot, and suffers no customer to have any voice as to what he shall do with her hair. A few evenings ago, being in attendance on the Duchess of ———, he entered her dressing-room, as usual, with the air of an autocrat.

"What dress do you wear to-night, Madame?" inquired Felix, leisurely drawing off his white kid gloves, as he approached the dressing-table, on which was laid out a magnificent set of coral ornaments.

"A white moire antique," was the reply.

"White moire," said the artiste, with a dissatisfied shrug, "the moire is very common place. All the plebeians' wives wear white moire."

"My dress is really very beautiful," returned the Duchess, humbly, "and certainly you won't see many plebeians' wives with such lace as that," she continued, with a wave of the hand toward the open door, through which her maid was entering with the dress extended, its lustrous tissue almost hidden under the splendid overskirt of point de Venice.

"With the lace it may pass muster," deigned to say the artiste, with a second shrug; "but as for the coral, it will not be becoming to your style of face."

"But Monsieur Felix, I am so fond of it. I thought of asking you to dress my hair with double braids, and these beautiful coral beads twisted in among the braids."

"But, Madame, your fancies are nothing to me. I can only dress your hair acording to my own inspirations—not according to yours. It is I, and not you, who am your hair-dresser. Coral is heavy, Anglican—fit only for creoles. A wreath of pomegranate blossoms would become you admirably."

"Nevertheless, Monsieur Felix," murmured the lady—

"If you have no confidence in me, Madame, call in another artiste. I am responsible for the good looks of my clients," returned the artiste haughtily, drawing on his gloves, and moving towards the door.

The moment was critical. In another minute the capillary autocrat would have re-entered his elegant coupe, and have been on his way to the dressing-room of some more pliant "client."

"Justine," said the Duchess, addressing her maid, "take away these ornaments, and bring the box of pomegranate flowers."

"And a few diamonds," added the autocrat, replacing his gloves in his pocket and taking up a comb.

The only hair-dresser who pretends to dispute the supremacy of Felix is Petrus, the hair dresser of the Grand Duchess of Baden, who passes his existence in a state of vibration between Paris and Baden. Felix is, in reality, as autocratic as Petrus, but he is the most adroit and delicate of flatterers; never assumes an air of command, but contents himself with leading instead of driving.

If Petrus is about to ornament the head of a brunette, he takes occasion to remark that all the great historic women were dark, and expatiates on Miriam, Judith, Semiramis, Lucretia, Rachel. Malibran, and so on, dwelling on their "majestic brows, crowned with a diadem of jet." If Petrus happens to be operating on a blonde, he admiringly remarks: "When God created a companion for Adam, he gave her your hair and lustrous tresses; and if any proof were needed of the superiority of your shade of hair, it would be found in the fact that among our old German ancestors the brunettes powdered gold dust among their dark locks." If he be called to give the aid of his art to ladies among whose dark or golden hair the silver lines are beginning to show themselves, he reminds them that white hair was the "rage" in the time of Louis XV., and prophesies a speedy revival of the same preference. "In a short time all the ladies will wear powder, and you will see how charmingly becoming this fashion will be for your smooth and graceful forehead." The inexhaustible flattery of the Grand Ducal hair-dresser has an agreeable and acceptable comment for all his customers.

Maj.-Gen. Crittenden, accompanied by Maj. Buford, Capt Knox and Capt. McCook, members of his staff, have left Washington to report to Maj.-Gen. Sherman.

Maj.-Gen. F. J. Herron has assumed command of all the U.S. forces on the coast, and Rio Grande frontier of Texas, headquarters at Brownsville, Texas.

DOMESTIC RECEIPTS.

HOW PHILADELPHIA BUTTER IS MADE.—After the milk is drawn from the cows it should be strained into pans properly arranged on a bench for the purpose, with a small quantity of fresh sour milk in each one, to hasten the raising of the cream, which should on all occasions be taken off from thirty to thirty-six hours after being milked, it being found that by standing longer in a large dairy more is lost by deteriorating the quality of the butter than is gained in quantity. When the cream is skimmed off the milk into a large cream-pot, it should be put in the butter-hole in the spring, and let stand one day and then skimmed off, so as to remove any sour milk that may have settled from it to the bottom of the pot, and should be subsequently stirred every day until churned, to prevent rancidity from taking place on top of the cream by too long standing, which is the main cause of all the strong butter that is made. The cream should be churned twice in the week during the summer months, and all the year, where there is a sufficient quantity to warrant it. The temperature of the cream and churn should be about 62 degrees, so as to insure the butter to come right, and in the proper length of time, which should be about thirty minutes. There is much danger in having the butter come soft by over-churning, as by the atmosphere being too hot. In order to regulate the temperature of the cream in the fall, winter and spring, it should be set in a tub of hot water until it comes to the temperature above designated—the butter broken in the churn to the size of peas and chestnuts. The buttermilk should be drawn off through a fine hair sieve from the vent of the churn, which should be about an inch hole. A sufficient quantity of spring water should then be put in, and a few revolutions of the churn, when it should be drawn off, and then another quantity of spring water put in, and tumbled in the churn until gathered into a mass. The water should all then be drawn off, and the butter cut into cracks, as it lies in the churn to receive the salt, which should be a pint for fifty pound, regulating below that, or above that according to the quantity churned. The butter should then be tumbled in the churn until the salt is mixed with it, and it will then do to to take out in ten or fifteen pounds, and lump into pounds, ready for sponging, which should be done by having a sponge of a proper size inclosed in a linen cloth and passed over the lump by pressure, to absorb the brine and moisture it contains which should then be weighed and printed if intended for the market. The sponge should be frequently squeezed out of cold water as dry as possible during the sponging and weighing of fifty or one hundred pounds.

CANNING FRUITS.—A correspondent of the Country Gentleman seasonably reminds the readers of that journal that many fruits may be preserved with little or no sugar. The correspondent says: Currants, gooseberries, peaches and pears require no sugar to preserve them. Raspberries and blackberries do not require more than four ounces of sugar to a pound of fruit, and strawberries but little more. We have now the different kinds, nearly as fresh and good as when first gathered. Put them up the same way as if you used the usual quantity of sugar; that is, expel the cold air by heating the fruit after it is placed in the jars, by setting the jars in cold water, which heat to boiling. The jars that we use are self-sealing, with zinc covers, which can be screwed on before the jar is removed from the hot water. We have never lost a jar put up in them.

HOW TO COOK A HAM.—Never put a ham in cold water, and be equally careful never to place one in boiling water. First let the water become lukewarm, and then put the ham in. Let it simmer or boil lightly for four or five hours—five is better than four—then take it out and shave the rind off. Rub granulated sage into the whole surface of the ham, so long as it can be made to receive it. Place the ham in a baking dish, with a bottle of champagne or prime cider. Baste occasionally with the juice, and let it baste an hour in a gentle heat. A slice from a nicely cured ham, thus baked, is enough to animate the ribs of death.

BUNIONS.—The formation of a bunion may in the beginning be prevented, but only in the beginning; for when once actually formed, it is scarcely possible ever to get rid of it, and it remains an everlasting plague. To prevent the formation of a bunion, it is necessary whenever and wherever a boot or shoe pinches to have it eased at once, and so long as that part of the foot pinched remains tender, not to put on the offending shoe again. When a bunion has once completely formed, if the person wish to have any peace, and not have it increase, he must have a last made to fit his foot, and have his shoe made upon it. And whenever the bunion inflames, and is painful, it must be bathed with warm water and poulticed at night.

TO RESTORE THE HAIR.—When the hair becomes thin from illness, use the following receipt: Mix equal parts of olive oil and spirits of rosemary, add a few drops of oil of nutmeg, and anoint the head very sparingly before going to bed.

BLACK DYE.—This is for either wool, hair, fur, or silk. Boil the articles for two hours in a decoction of nutgalls, and afterwards keep them for two hours more in a bath composed of logwood and sulphate of iron; kept during the whole time at a scalding heat, but not boiling. During the operation they must frequently be exposed to the air. The common proportions are five parts of gall, five of sulphate of iron, and thirty of logwood for every hundred of cloth. Sometimes a little acetato of copper (verdigris) is added to improve the color. Woollen cloth, before it receives a black color, is usually dyed blue; this renders the color much fuller and finer than it would otherwise be. If the cloth is coarse, the blue dye may be too expensive; in that case, a brown color is given by means of walnut shells. Silk is dyed in the same manner as wool, except that as it imbibes a larger quantity of tannin, the quantity of galls must be increased to twice as much, and the silk remain longer in the solution.

Col. Marshall Lefferts, late commander of the 7th N. Y National Guard, has been appointed a Brigadier-General by Gov. Seymour.

Brig.-Gen. N. C. McLean has been ordered to an important position in Kentucky, and will make his headquarters at Lexington.

EMBROIDERY.—In the days of yore embroidering was esteemed so long and wearisome a task, that Perault condemned a beautiful princess to embroider her wedding-dress with the rays of the sun. Now-a-days, embroidering is made a pleasure instead of a toil. With the Grover & Baker Sewing-machine the most beautiful embroidery can be worked with the same ease, rapidity and perfection that it performs all other kinds of sewing. This faculty of the sewing-machine, which is peculiar to Grover & Baker's, must prove of infinite value to ladies who desire to keep up with the fashion of embroidered garments, now so popular.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following notices reach us from the Eastern press:

We have received the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly journal just started in San Francisco, under the editorial charge of Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman well known to New York journalism. Mr. Webb was for several years attached to the editorial staff of the New York Times, where he occupied the responsible post of literary editor, and where his criticisms were the object of special remark for their freshness and piquancy. His new enterprise, THE CALIFORNIAN, bears the impress of his editorial skill on every page. It is a handsome paper of sixteen pages, about the size of the Round Table before it was cut down, and not unlike that journal in character and scope. It is printed upon a quality of paper which in these days seems almost prodigally fine. If such a journal can be sustained in California it is certainly a good token for the literary taste of the land of gold. At all events judging from the first number, no man is more capable of directing its career in a successful path than its projector and editor.—Boston Transcript.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new literary paper with this title comes to us from San Francisco. It is refreshing to the eyes of a printer to read its beautiful print upon clear white paper, and its contents are rich and varied, bearing mark of care and scholarship, enlivened with a vein of humor, that promises for it a position in the first rank of our native publications. It is edited by Charles H. Webb, Esq., formerly of the New York Times, and latterly the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, whose department of racy "Things" in that paper was read with delight by every one this way on whom the Era dawned. "Things"—snappy and epigrammatic as ever—have a place in THE CALIFORNIAN, and we would press upon our readers that they could do no better than send on and subscribe for it. The paper bears at its head the motto, appropriate for its own character, as well as for the State: "Surely there is a vein for the silver and a place for the gold where they fine it."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly journal just started in San Francisco, is a remarkably handsome paper of sixteen pages, printed in a superior manner and made up of editorial and selected matter indicating ability and excellent judgment. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a well-known New York journalist, is the editor, and he seems to have entered upon his work with a vigor that, if continued, will render his paper inferior to no literary newspaper in America. Mr. Webb has gained a name for freshness, piquancy and spirit in his writings, and will undoubtedly make THE CALIFORNIAN a household friend not in San Francisco only but in every Eastern city.—Boston Post.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published in a handsome quarto form, and conducted by Mr. C. H. Webb, formerly one of the editors of the New York Times. Mr. Webb is a pleasant and versatile writer, and won an excellent reputation during his experience of journalism in this city. He went to California one or two years ago, but ventured for the first time upon an independent enterprise in May last, when the first number of the CALIFORNIAN appeared. The paper claims to be "devoted to live topics and the best interests of California," and inasmuch as it shows a disposition to redeem this promise, being very lively and honest, it deserves success.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The following are a few of the notices which have appeared in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the CALIFORNIAN is the best. The noveletto is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest publication known to us. The CALIFORNIAN is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best bow on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-bred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

THE first number of the CALIFORNIAN, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The CALIFORNIAN contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

CALIFORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the CALIFORNIAN, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

And the following we clip from the country exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the name of a new weekly literary paper which is to make its début in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the business affairs of his journal properly, it is sure to succeed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attainments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. The journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the CALIFORNIAN appears to be, and if the publisher will send us his journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have received the second number of the new hebdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under the above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The high literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgment displayed in its selections, and its neat typographical execution, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a large and neatly printed weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" the first number from our table before we had examined it; the second number, however, is before us, and we find it filled with reading matter, original and selected, of the highest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured that they will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat and plain in typography, and gives evidence of the best of editorial talent.—Placerville Weekly News.

MRS. HENDRICKS,
No. 629 MISSION STREET,
Devotes herself exclusively to
EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,
And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.
Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds : "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

And as for COUGHS AND COLDS, the world never saw a better remedy, and never will, until nature produces some new ingredient out of which to prepare it. Don't be afraid to use it freely. Every article in it is from nature's own laboratory—the same today as they were a thousand years ago—all calculated to soothe, heal and strengthen. There is no

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of

WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder, wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, DR. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be treated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute. Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

THE CALIFORNIA COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE,

FOR GIRLS,

Nos. 64, 66, 68 and 70 SILVER STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

MRS. M. B. SWEDENSTIERNA, PRINCIPAL.

TWELFTH SESSION,

Commencing August 8th, 1864.

THIS INSTITUTION IS DESIGNED TO AFFORD FACILities for the education of girls, fully equal to those furnished at the best Seminaries of the Atlantic States. The course of study is unusually comprehensive, embracing all the branches that the best modern authorities have thought could be advantageously incorporated in the most enlarged scheme of Female Education. In the Collegiate Department it includes the higher mathematics; a course of English Literature and Criticism, taught by a method not elsewhere pursued; Natural History; the Physical Geography of the Pacific Coast; Critical and Universal Grammar; Ecclesiastical History; and the modern applications of Physical Science.

The organization of the School into departments and graded classes, facilitates the pursuit of a regular and systematic course of study. No pupil is permitted to take up the higher branches until thoroughly grounded in the preparatory ones. In the advanced classes, the instruction is to a great extent independent of text-books; and in no case is "going through the book," considered equivalent to "finishing a study."

Calisthenics, consisting of the wand-exercise, etc., take place in the gymnasium daily, from 12 to 12 1-2 o'clock.

Parents, guardians, and others interested in the thorough education of girls, are invited to call and witness for themselves the methods of instruction pursued, the general organization of the school, and its daily workings, which furnish a more reliable test of the excellence of such institutions, than any public examination. No particular "visiting days" have been appointed, the Principal and teachers being gratified by the attendance of visitors, at their daily recitations, at any time and without unusual preparation. Such visits do not in any way interrupt or interfere with the regular routine.

Registers containing full particulars as to the course of study, terms, regulations, etc., can be obtained upon application by mail, or to the Principal personally, at the Seminary. jy16-tf

THE HERO OF SUGAR PINE.—A FRAGMENT.

"OH tell me, Sergeant of Battery B,
O hero of Sugar Pine!
Some glorious deed of the battle-field,
Some wonderful feat of thine.

"Some skilful move when the fearful game
Of battle and life was played
On yon grimy field, whose broken squares
In scarlet and black are laid."

"Ah, stranger, here at my gun all day,
I fought till my final round
Was spent, and I had but powder left,
And never a shot to be found;

"So I trained my gun on a rebel piece:
So true was my range and aim,
A shot from his cannon entered mine
And finished the load of the same!"

"Enough! O Sergeant of Battery B,
O hero of Sugar Pine!
Alas! I fear that thy cannon's throat
Can swallow much more than mine!"

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday. August 20th, 1864.

A LETTER in one of the lively dailies relates that the people of Washoe at present are lying on their oars. To my thinking they have been lying on their ores ever since the country was first discovered, and I cannot learn that they have done much else!

For a year past it has been rung in my ears that an investment in anything located on the Comstock ledge was safe and sure; they told me it was the "mother ledge of the district." With more propriety it might be called the mother-in-law ledge, for there are more suits in progress now regarding claims located on it than can be decided in this generation.

I made a small purchase, a year or so since, in ground to which I have lately ascertained that seven companies lay claim. Seven injunctions have been issued, seven assessments have been levied, seven referees have been taking testimony, which seven hundred witnesses furnished, for the past seven months, seventy times seven lawyers have been employed, and if the case is decided in the next seven years you may call me the seventh son-of-a-gun.

They say the Wide West has recently "struck it rich." No particulars are given as to what it has struck, but it is gratifying to know that it has struck something. It struck me once, and I'm yet suffering too much from the blow to feel any temptation to blow for that or any other mine.

The fact of the matter is, I'm rather incredulous so far as stocks are concerned. It would be hard to persuade me to buy a whipstock unless it were for the purpose of chastising Comstock, the discoverer of that famous "mother ledge" that begins by making all who have anything to do with it "ante," and finishes by sending them to their "uncle."

I had an original interest in a Mexican mine once. It promised well, remarkably well: the news from there was always excellent, though unaccompanied by nuggets.

Scarcely comprehending how so excellent a mine could fail to make a return, I wrote to the Superintendent, who, by the way, was an intimate friend of mine. It was a private letter, and in it I desired him to give me private and particular and precise information regarding affairs.

The reply came in Spanish, and was somewhat verbose. He stated that everything was going on swimmingly, but that they couldn't work the mine much for want of water. How things could go on swimmingly without water I couldn't see, nor have I been able to see to this day. He said he'd write me more at length soon.

He did. It was necessary, he said, to levy an immediate assessment. They couldn't work the mine then, because it was full of water, and must wait until the rainy season was over.

It struck me as being remarkably curious. They couldn't work the mine when they had no water, and when they had the mine full of it they were worse off than before. The prospects for bars began to look bad, and I determined to sell out. The only thing that deterred me was a trivial difficulty which arose from the fact that I could find no one to buy.

I then determined to go down and look after my property. We were some days if not more going down to Mazatlan. When I was a boy I thought holidays came around very slowly, but their rate of progression was rapid compared to that of Holladay's Line. But we got there at last, and I started out to find my mine.

It was located on the top of an inaccessible mountain many thousand feet above the level of the sea. This didn't surprise me, for it had been above the level of my "see" for some time. But the difficulty of getting up to it puzzled me, and it subsequently appeared that it had puzzled all who ever made the attempt. The Superintendent had never been there; he got all his reports from a man who lived down in the valley, so it turned out that his reports were nothing but echoes.

The mill which we shipped a year or two before at a cost of some fifty thousand dollars, had been put up at a small town thirty leagues distant from the mine, and was then running regularly, grinding mule-feed for the rude ranches of the primeval people who inhabit that damnable country.

After superhuman exertions, I succeeded in reaching the top of the mountain. I then comprehended fully what the Superintendent meant by writing up "our prospects are excellent." A better prospect than could be had from the top of that mountain on a clear day I never in my life enjoyed. One could see, to use a favorite phrase with tourists, "just so far as the eye could reach."

That one cannot see any further is scarcely to be wondered at in the generality of cases, perhaps; but I'll swear that standing on the summit of that infernal Mexican mountain in the grey of that Mexican morning, I saw much further than I could reach.

"Standing with me upon the property which our company possesses," my friend had said to me in one of his excellently written letters, "you can see ore in every direction!"

He was right. Standing on the property which the company possessed in the grey of that Mexican morning, I looked o'er it and could see o'er in every direction. Glancing over the company's books, too, I saw a record of owers in abundance, but they were the individuals who held stock in the company. The Superintendent had borrowed money from every firm in Mazatlan that was willing to lend it to him; he had plunged the company in debt for more than the whole of them were worth unitedly—and what he had done with the money he didn't know himself, but he said we might rest assured that it had been honestly applied.

Had I been wearing boots at the time, they would have been more honestly applied than ever a pair were before, but the people of that country wear nothing but pumps—we must ship a pump, by the way, to another mine in which I'm interested on the next steamer—and their thin soles refused to convey any adequate idea of my indignation.

As for a mine, there was none there, never had been, and in all probability never would be. There were not even "iron pyrites" on the property, though there was any quantity of pirates that would steal. In place of all the goods and chattels that it had been represented that we bought with the mine and were possessed of, we had neither horses nor oxen, nor even a mule—if you except the subscriber who stood there, a solitary but representative jackass.

At this moment I awoke, and lo! it was all a dream—but a dream so near the truth that I'm barely satisfied that I'm not a jackass yet, and keep pinching my ears to assure myself to the contrary. Notwithstanding the fact that they are tolerably short, a longing for thistles at any particular time would scare me mightily.

I might as well add that the sound which awakened me was a cannon, fired to announce the arrival of the Mexican steamer.

She brought me news that a late speculation was turning out eminently well; that a grand bonanza had been struck several thousand feet below the surface; that the mill was running; and she likewise brought specimens of ore which the Secretary sits by, night and day, brooding over them as a hen might over unusually large eggs, and clucking: "Rock of Refuge, cleft for me."

To explain that joke, it is necessary to state that the mine is named Refugio.

AT THE BALL.

I like to go to balls; in fact I like to go anywhere where people are gathered together. An old lady once gave it as her opinion that the opera was principally composed of gas and gaiters, and her idea applies remarkably well to balls. The music, and the lights, and the low-necked dresses, and the roses and camelias which the girls wear in their hair, and the floating muslin, and the glitter of diamonds, and the pale splendor of pearls—all together these things get me, and I can stand entranced for an hour, watching the beauties as they float by, admiring the calm and composure with which Mrs. Flittergibbet lies in young Sniffkin's arms as he whirls her around in the rapid waltz, and also admiring the calm and composure with which Mr. Flittergibbet stands it. I like to stand and see the gay show go on, and bring myself down by a process of ratiocination to believe that, after all, life is neither real nor earnest, and that we haven't any souls to save, and that the whole world is made up of point-lace and pea-nuts and puppies.

But there is a deal of earnestness beneath all the glare and glitter; warm hearts palpitate beneath those little bodices, eyes have serious meanings in them though the lips may lightly laugh, and the same arm that lightly presses a waist in the whirl of the dance is strong enough, and has the inclination at times, to drive a sudden, swift blow well home.

Murder has been done at a ball, and it was at a ball that the following lines were written:

MY RIVAL.

SOFT music swells out on the night,
The air is athrob with perfume,
And the feet of the dancers fall light—
Yet Death crouches low in the room.

One stands him all smiling and bland,
Just there where the tapestries fall,
The wine-cup he holds in his hand
Throws a dabble of red on the wall.

His fool-face hot flushes with love,
And he whispers a name in his wine—
The white moon that looked from above
And the stars know the woman is mine.

It were better he said him a prayer:
Were the man not a fool he would feel
A shudder of death in the air,
And the sharp, sudden tingle of steel.

See! he smiles to himself as he sips
Of his wine in the alcove apart—
Will he smile when my dagger's thin lips
Shall drink the red wine of his heart?

I'm writing against time and space this week. There is simply the first page to fill, and my only purpose at present is to fill it.

Between "Keinman" and The Countess, this week, they came very near counting out

INIGO.

MEN cannot excel in more things than one, and if they can, they had better be quiet about it.

A GAME OF BRAG.

It is possible that many respectable persons may be unaware of the attributes and nature of the game at Brag; more popular though it be, as a method of making money change hands, than any invention under the sun, and counting its devotees by thousands in the Old World and in the New. A gentleman on board a United States river-steamboat "bragged" at this game no less than two millions of dollars; and upon his antagonists doubting whether he possessed the money, produced a little carpet-bag crammed with notes to a much greater amount than the sum named. It turned out that he was a government commissioner in charge of the money to pay the troops in Texas, and had thus taken advantage of his opportunity to back his cards for an amount that put all competition out of the question. In America, this entrancing pursuit, under the alias of "Poker," causes more speculation than all Wall street. In India, officers in Her Majesty's service on sick-leave in the hills, play unceasingly, with their hats cocked over their eyes to conceal the working of their intelligent countenances, and even—as we are assured—with masks on; for a gentleman who possesses expressive features should not play "brag"—for reasons that will presently appear—and there is even a theory that the vacant looks of the officers of the household troops are caused by their wish to become proficients at this extraordinary and important pastime.

It is a game which is played with cards, three of which are dealt to each person. The best hand that can possibly be obtained is that which consists of three aces; the next best three kings, three queens, three knaves, etc.; after these, which, of course, seldom occur, two aces, two kings, two queens, etc., are excellent cards to "brag" upon; then sequences; then pips of the same suit, the ace counting for eleven. Nothing can be simpler than this; and besides it, there is no skill to be acquired whatever, but simply the art of dissimulation. Having got my hand (I never played this hateful game in my life, but write in the first person for the sake of perspicuity and ease,) which consists, say, of two twos, I keep them carefully to myself, and upon being asked by the dealer if I brag, I reply: "Yes, certainly," with the air of a man who has three tens at least. Some of the company have such bad hands, that they don't brag at all, but throw them up at once, and forfeit their stakes for that deal; others like myself decide to "brag." If the brag is unlimited as to stake, as it too often is, I say: "I brag five pounds, or ten, or twenty;" then such of the rest as are not alarmed at the magnitude of that sum, brag the same; and each adds that money to the pool. In other words, each bets his twenty pounds (suppose) that his hand is better than that of any other person in the company. It may be a very bad hand indeed, and yet by offering to back it with large sums, and a fearless impudence of manner, he may frighten his neighbors into believing that it is a very good one, and so into relinquishing their chance. Everything depends, it will be seen, upon secrecy and resolution. It was at this game that President Lincoln's Commissary lost that great sum intended for the store department, playing with gamblers having a confederate in the room above, who could see his cards through a hole in the floor, and communicated their value to his accomplices.

There is, however, this check upon inordinate bragging: any player, upon paying twice the amount of the previous "brag," is privileged to look at another player's hand—at mine, for instance. If his cards are better than my two twos, he, of course, has nothing to fear from me, at all events, and goes on staking; and he sometimes goes on, if they are worse, either to frighten me out of the field, or to induce me to give him twice the previous brag to look at his hand. Brag is, in short, the merest excuse for betting, that was ever called a game; in addition to which, it renders deception absolutely necessary; for if it was guessed by a player's genuine air and manner that he had really a good hand, his opponents would not stake at all, and he would reap no gains beyond the small sum originally placed in the pool by each. It will easily be understood that the cards must not have the least mark upon the backs of them; and therefore white cards are commonly used in this exciting contest—for amusement it can scarcely be called. Now, in that railway which connects the two great commercial towns of Lancashire, many of the every-day passengers are accustomed to while away the journey by playing cards together; they know one another, and make up their rubbers beforehand, and even have certain carriages retained at either terminus for their special accommodation and diversion. Whist is, of course, the usual game among them; but with some of the the juniors that beautiful science is voted dull and slow, and they play Brag instead—a disgraceful taste, which is very properly reprobated by the rest, and stigmatized as "sheer gambling," even by those who pass their mid-days in the Stock Exchange and risk hundreds and thousands upon scrip and share. However, it so happened, last July, that I, a chance passenger between Liverpool and Manchester, with a return ticket for the day, found myself in a first-class carriage, occupied by five gentlemen, playing at this redoubtable game; and without having the least desire to join them, I watched their proceedings with some attention, and was rewarded by witnessing what was admitted by all to be an unprecedented occurrence, and one well worthy, if not of immortal verse, at least of printed record. For the first twenty minutes, I should mention, they played whist—of course with two packs of cards—but upon the remonstrance of the gentleman who found himself cut out and obliged to make room for the fifth man at the railway rug, which was their card table, they hanged that game to Brag.

While my moral nature was shocked, I could not help being interested by the secretiveness of each competitor, but the air of confidence with which they backed an indifferent hand, by the affected hesitation with which they continued to brag upon a good one, and by their close scanning of one another's countenances, in which nothing but cunning and avarice were to be traced. And yet, in the sense of playing for high stakes, they were not gambling. A sovereign or thirty shillings was the most that had been lost by any person, when presently, the rest having thrown up their hands, two players began to back their cards at such considerably higher sums as to arouse everybody's curiosity to know what they were staking on.

"Let me look at you, Jones," cried one; "I'm not playing, you know, and Smith will never be able to tell anything by my face."

"That is true, my dear fellow," replied Jones coolly. "If want of expression could beget confidence, one could trust in your face as much as in any man's. But I can't let you see my cards. Smith, I brag five pounds."

"I brag ten," was the response. "And allow me to warn you as a friend not to back yourself extravagantly, for you'll lose, my Jones, and you're a family man."

Here took place a burst of laughter; this was a new ruse, indeed, to affect interest in the state of an adversary's pocket in order to make him give in.

"Well, replied Jones, "you're a bachelor, it is true, but you cannot afford to lose twenty-five pounds, and that is the amount of my next brag."

"I brag twenty-five pounds also," remarked Smith cheerfully.

"Then I will brag fifty pounds," returned Jones, "and rather than go on, I solemnly tell you, you should give me a hundred to look at my hand."

"I wouldn't give a farthing to look at your hand," answered the other scornfully. "I am really sorry to ruin you, but your obstinacy brings it upon yourself. You will have to part with Mrs. Jones' piano as it is, I expect."

"Sir," replied Jones with resolution, "upon the cards which I hold here I would brag Mrs. Jones herself with the utmost confidence."

"You had better not," responded the bachelor darkly. And again there was a shriek of laughter from the audience who were not permitted to be spectators.

"Now, my dear Smith, let us understand one another. If you continue to play this game, you will never ride in a first-class carriage again. I should be sorry to be the means of driving you into the 'parliamentary.' Tell me how much money you can afford to lose without going to jail, and I will brag that."

"I will brag two hundred and fifty pounds," quoth Smith calmly; "and you had better give me a bill of cash upon your furniture at once. I am quite sure you haven't got so much in your banker's hands."

"I will brag five hundred," answered Jones with his teeth clenched. "I will brag my house and garden; I will brag myself and my government situation. If, instead of being in the express-train, we were in the middle ages, and you were the Old Gentleman himself, I warn you that I would brag my soul."

"Then you would lose it," responded Smith, "to a dead certainty, and I should have made a very indifferent bargain. Now, listen. Let the last brag of two hundred and fifty stand; and Robinson and Lloyd shall look at my hand, and Brown at yours. Then we will be bound by their advice, and if they say to either of us 'Stop,' we will do so."

"Very good," quoth Jones; showing his cards with a grim smile to his left-hand neighbor. I would have given anything to see them also, but being a stranger, I did not venture to ask to do so. Do you think, Brown, I ought to give in with a hand like this, or do you not?"

"It is quite impossible," observed Mr. Brown solemnly, "that any man should give up such cards. I think, under the circumstances, that I am almost justified in saying that Smith cannot win."

"What do you say?" inquired Smith, turning the face of his cards to his two friends with the most careful secrecy, and watching for their reply with triumphant confidence.

"It's absurd," quoth Mr. Robinson; "you're sure of winning."

"I would lay a thousand pounds upon such cards,' said Mr. Lloyd.

"Stop!" exclaimed Jones; "I will brag a thousand pounds myself, and what he can't pay, I will let him off, after having sold his books and personal clothing. We are now getting close to Manchester. Let us each wrap up our cards in a newspaper, and go into the station, and get them sealed up; then we can call for them in the evening, and brag all the way home. You miserable Smith! you set out this morning in competence; you will return a beggar."

"You will indeed," corroborated Mr. Brown.

"Unhappy Jones," quoth Smith; "certainly those whom the gods wish to destroy, they first make mad. This morning you probably complained of the kidneys being underdone at breakfast. To-morrow, your wife and children will be in want of daily bread."

"They will indeed," echoed Messrs. Lloyd and Robinson.

"Gentlemen," said I, "it seems to me this matter will never be settled except by arbitration. I have not the honor of the personal acquaintance of any of you, but I am an honest man; and if both the players will show their cards to me, I will tell them truly which ought to give in. This will be better and more pleasing, I am sure, whether to winner or loser, than the utter ruin of either of them can possibly be."

"I am quite content with that arrangement," observed Smith, "although, of course, it is a pecuniary sacrifice."

"You're a noble fellow!" exclaimed Messrs. Lloyd and Robinson, with irrepressible admiration.

"Then I am also content," remarked Jones, "although I must needs lose by such an arrangement."

"Generous being!" exclaimed Mr. Brown enthusiastically; "yes, he needs must lose."

I rose from my seat, and looked over Smith's cards. He had three aces—the best hand that any man can hold. I turned from him with sorrow in my heart for the poor married man, and looked over Jones' cards. He had three aces, also! When they left off playing whist, the white packs had got somehow mixed together, and so the two gentlemen had had all their excitement for nothing. They had each enjoyed the luxury of ruining a friend, in imagination, and of being magnanimous at a cheap rate; and if it had not been for the interposition of the present writer, it is my belief that they would have been Bragging still.

YOUTHFUL PRESIDENT.—The Emperor of the French lately received a deputation of twelve youths belonging to the department of the Morbihan, who had come to solicit his Majesty's permission to offer to the Prince Imperial the presidency of the agricultural show which is about to be held on the estate of the Princess Bacciocchi, at Korn-e-Houet. The Emperor received the youths with his ordinary kindness, and expressed to them his "regret that the tender age of his Imperial Highness did not permit him to accede to their wishes." Sensible answer.

A VISIT TO THE DEPTHS.

CREEPING stealthily on,
Shunning the light of day,
Lurking in hidden dens,
And womanhood its prey—
Was there a deeper sense
In that myth of the olden time,
When the land gave its fairest flower
To the monster bred of the slime?

A monster bred of the slime,
Trailing along the shore
Of our common humanity,
Like that mythic beast of yore;
Daily we pass his den;
We know he is lurking there;
We smile a conventional smile,
Or pray an unmeaning prayer.

Her cheek as soft and fair
As the sisters you daily pass;
Her small hand lay in yours
With a kindly meek caress;
Her voice was sweet and clear,
She sang with a woman's grace;
Did you think for an instant you caught
A cloud on that sunny face?

Did you ask her to sing of home?
Was it meet for a thing impure?
Was there sadness in her glance?
Or—fool! was it only a lure?
Believe me she knows her trade—
That lesson is learned too well;
And yet they say that scarce a year
Has passed since first she fell.

Did you shudder at the thought
Of a mother's kiss just now?
No earthly fountain will wash
That stain from lip and brow.
You will long for the simple heart,
For the honor clear and high,
For the soul that can look without bitter shame,
On maiden's purity.

O! but her voice was sweet,
Yet it had a hollow ring;
And her face was passing fair—
The more of gold 'twould bring;
And her eyes were deep and dark,
Lit with a passionate glow—
Could you see the reckless soul
Drowned in the depth below.

Was a woman the mother of Christ?
God! what a fearful fall!
Man, your sin against one
Is an equal sin to all.
Pity her wisely and well,
For you can never know
In what wild hour of anguish fell
The white star from her brow.

Under the beauty and grace,
Lurked there no hideous thought?
Was it a woman you held—
Or a thing to be sold and bought?
Had the wheels of the mammon-car
Another victim crushed?
Or on some early lover's breast
Was her woman's virtue hushed?

Hushed to a brief repose,
To wake to a wild remorse—
Hushed to a soft, sweet dream,
To wake to an infinite loss.
Picture it if you can—
The story is overtrue;
Then swear no woman's soul or fame
Shall be one shade the blacker for you.

GOOD IN A VICIOUS PONY.—The following story was recently told me by the gentleman who met with the adventure: He had a pony which was very much attached to him, and very gentle with him, but which would not allow any one else to mount him. He was given to flying at and biting strangers—a quality which turned to the advantage of his owner. One morning my friend was on the march through the jungle, his coolies and servants following with his baggage, guns, etc., and he walking with his pony's bridle over his arm. It would appear that a bear was just then regaling himself in the pathway, by an ant-hill which concealed his interesting figure from the traveller's view until close upon him. Suddenly the gentleman felt himself thrown down, with the bear on his back, pawing and scratching him. Knowing that there were four loaded guns in the hands of his attendants, he called out to them to fire, and at the same time struck backward at the bear with a stick which lay within his reach. No one fired, however, and he did not know what to do, when suddenly he heard a scrimmage; next moment the weight was removed from his shoulders, and on looking up he saw the bear in full flight and the pony after him with his ears set back. He got up and shook himself, and saw his guns lying on the ground; his attendants had all disappeared. He was about to retrace his footsteps, when he heard several voices saying, "Here we are!" and on looking up, he saw his people perched high in the trees. They told him that the pony had flown at the bear with such fury that he had taken to his heels in the manner described. Moral—There is some good in a biting and kicking pony.—Trifles from Ceylon.

OZONIZED water is now used for drinking and the toilet. It is advertised in London in the following style: "Its use is attended by a sensation which has been aptly described as the 'perfume of purity.' Being perfectly innoxious and tasteless a few drops make a most refreshing and invigorating addition to the tumbler of plain drinking or soda water, from which it will remove all trace of soluble organic matter, a fact of infinite importance to the voyager or the invalid. When employed for the toilet, bath, etc., it removes from the mouth all impure and foreign tastes and odors, whether arising from natural or artificial causes, such as the practice of smoking, and counteracts the irritation and morbid effects of carious teeth. It purifies and softens the skin, and tends to promote a healthy state of the whole body by removing all secretions and restoring a wholesome condition."

ALL the blows we strike should be for a purpose. Every nail driven should be as another rivet in the machine of the universe.

A PICTURE IN THREE PANELS.

HOW many years is it, I ask, since I first listened to that music? And you come and lean over the back of my chair and call me foolish. I know you are there, though I do but look on into the fire and read from a book whose pages no printing press hath touched. Foolish, am I? Well, I am only living over again some old days, happy and unhappy, which have made you and I what we are. Foolish! You forget that you have been playing the "Coro religioso," and that when I first heard it—well, go your way, and while you are gone let me think out the story and paint my picture.

PANEL I.

You stood, one of a merry party, near the piano, with your hand on the chair of the player, even as it rested on mine but now. I saw you for the first time, and you were singing the "Coro religioso;" I heard your voice amongst all others, distinct and clear. I was to have taken the Count's part, but, foolish then as I am now, some strange bewilderment seized me, and your cousin Ernest Haughton stepped forward with his resolute, musical "No, no, non piu," which I ought to have sung. I sank back abashed, and looked at you both. His hand touched your shoulder—how dared he? And I saw how handsome he was, how polished; with "gentleman" written in every line of his mobile face and every movement of his figure. I heard some one say, "well matched;" and it was true. You looked well together—a fitting couple. Do you see me there, in the dark shadow of the door, biting my moustache and watching you? I was a great, strong, rough fellow compared with Ernest, and I felt it. I was unused to ladies' society; no mother or sister had taught me gentleness, or its simulation; and so, seeing you for the first time, and feeling my own awkwardness, jealousy took possession of me. I would have had that smoothfaced Ernest out on the hill-side with the hounds in full cry and a mighty fence before him; then, would he have beaten me? But there, in the drawing-room, he shone and triumphed, while I stood in the shade watching him.

There is the first panel of my picture. You remember it, I know, but it is not written on your brain as it is on mine.

Its color was on the days that followed, and it had set a mark on my life forever. You know how at first you thought me shy and awkward, and in your kindness tried to draw out my scanty words on every occasion; at least, I thought so, and I would not be drawn out. I preferred watching you and your cousin, gloomily; I was in a fever of infatuation, or I should have quitted the house that held you at once, instead of lingering on, buying dearly my first knowledge of the great passions of life. Ernest Haughton would have made friends with me, but I repulsed him; at times I heard him speak light words, which shook my first acknowledgment of admiration for him, and I believed from my heart that he was not worthy of you. Was I? That question never occurred to me; I contented myself with seeing his faults, not thinking of my own. I had a jealous envy of him, for all that; I delighted to outdo him in any way; often I have startled you by some wild feat of daring which I knew Ernest, with all his high spirit, would never attempt, but he only laughed at me. Once, I remember, your face grew pale at a momentary danger which I had scorned to fear; and when I saw that, a mad impulse came upon me, and I snatched your hand and pressed my lips upon it. Even then Ernest only turned away to hide a smile. I saw it though; I fancied it was a smile of triumph, and the thought drove me wild. He knew his security, and mocked my weakness. I felt, too, that your manner grew colder and more distant after that.

One day I came upon you suddenly amongst the shrubs; you were looking after the figure of Ernest in the distance, and there was sorrow in your face.

"He is going to leave us," you said. "He joins his ship to-morrow; and the separation is a painful one."

I could not keep my tone from being bitter: and you looked at me with reproachful wonder as you answered:

"Of course. He is my cousin."

A wild hope leaped up in my heart then for a moment, but it sank as quickly. I put it down with a strong hand, feeling that it was madness. I could bear this state of things no longer.

"I shall leave you, too," I said; "but that will be little loss."

You gave me no answer; and the ungraciousness of my speech struck me. But your head was turned away; I thought you were still looking after Ernest, and I did leave you. I said no further good-bye to you, but went away silent and miserable, determining to put you out of my thoughts for ever, as if such a thing were in one's own power.

For twelve long months I never saw you; I hunted, and shot, and fished; I tramped the country, high and low, but I bore about with me always the first panel of my picture; and nothing could drive out from my dreams the voice of Ernest with his "No, no, non piu," which should have been mine.

I had been rambling for some days amongst the Scottish hills, when the fine weather changed to rain—incessant, heavy; and I was kept prisoner at a wretched inn, where there was nothing to do or to see except the fierce splashes which beat against the window and ran down it in streams. I asked the waiter if it always rained there, and though his answer was as comforting as the response of a brother waiter to a similar query—"Na, na, man, it snaws whiles," yet he took pity upon my feckless, do-nothing condition, and brought in a pile of old newspapers. I turned them over listlessly. You know what caught my eye; the wreck of a vessel and the names of the lost: Lieut. Ernest Haughton amongst them. I looked at the date—it was six months back. Forgive me for it, you who know how my whole heart was still clinging about you; could I help the joy that burst from my lips that moment? I did not think of Ernest, of death, or of those who mourned his loss; I thought only that you were free; and that in the possible future which stretched out before my eyes, it might be mine to make up to you for a past sorrow.

I started in the pouring rain: what did I care for that then? I never slackened my speed till I stood once more in the well-known room, and saw you. You were in mourning, too; I looked at it jealously at first, thinking that six months had surely been sufficient tribute to the memory of a cousin. But my head grew dizzy as I looked at you, till your exclamation, half of pleasure, half of dismay, made me conscious of the figure I presented. Dabbled, mud-stained, a great rough fellow, then, as formerly, I stood before you ashamed of myself.

"If you did but know," I stammered, "how I have longed to see you again; how I have travelled night and day without stopping—"

You broke into my speech, to insist that I needed rest and refreshment, and must have it. You welcomed me—how I blessed you for it.

By and by you spoke of Ernest Haughton, and I took courage to ask one daring question, which nothing but your goodness could have pronounced excusable.

"Tell me one thing," I said. "Were you engaged to Ernest?"

The words slipped from my tongue, as though they had burnt it, and you looked at me calmly and answered "No."

But then I believed in my secret heart that it was only the word engagement which had been wanting. I hoped, however, from the calmness of your answer, that you were learning to forget; I must give you time for that. You would have talked on about Ernest, his friends, and the shock his death had been, but I changed the subject, and avoided it studiously. I wanted him to be far away in the past, not talked of, but forgotten. I flattered myself that I did not care what he had been to you once, now that it was all over, and I could not help my jealous nature, nor the madness which stung me at times when I heard you pronounce his name with—as I fancied—such regretful tenderness.

I curbed down my impatience for a while with the reflection that I must let you forget him; and then—remember it—I told my tale.

You seemed touched; I saw your lips tremble, but no word came from them. Then I went on, following up my own ideas and acting upon them. I said I did not care for first love—which was false—I wanted you to give me what you could; in time it would be your whole heart I trusted; and if some passing fancy had ever bound you to another, let it be forgotten. So that it was really past, I would never rake up its ashes.

You turned to me smilingly, and asked me falteringly, "Was I less exacting than others, that I promised so readily to be satisfied with a worn-out heart?"

Satisfied! No, I warned you of my jealous nature, but the music of a hundred joy-bells rang in my ears and stumbled from my tongue as I did so. Vehement and passionate always I scarcely think the old fire has died out of me even yet. At that time I might surely, in my security, have spoken of your cousin, and learnt the depth of your sorrow for him, but I would not. The sting which his name held even then terrified me, and I avoided all mention of him.

You seemed, too, so quiet and undisturbed, while the excitement of my new happiness was filling me with exuberant life, that I could not help at times tormenting myself with the reflection that it was neither new nor strange to you, as it is to me. I did not care much then, however: I was too happy, and I trusted to time. So that I might be with you, and know that you were my promised wife, I could be satisfied.

And you had always a welcome for me; were always ready to listen to my eager plans for the future, and to sympathize with them. Do you remember those summer evenings? How we lingered in the coppice of Feruwood, and saw the sunlight on the mill-stream; glancing through the trees, and playing amongst the underwood? How we sat on grassy knolls and talked, letting the time slip by unheeded, till you would suddenly start up and say there would be a scolding waiting for you at home? I know about those scoldings, do I not? A grave word of anxiety lest you should have taken cold, or stayed out too long; for I was not half careful enough of you. And do you remember standing with me in the shrubbery on the spot where Ernest Haughton had parted from you; and a momentary fancy came into my head that you were thinking of him. But when I looked into your quiet, contented face, and my thoughts died before it could have reached my lips. That was the eve of our wedding day. We were married. I cannot think of that time calmly; even now, when I would put the sternest touches to my picture, the excitement of that new happiness comes back to bid me pause.

Idiot, that I was! how came it that, by and by, dark thoughts began to rise up in my heart, and to have a recognized place there? That I looked upon your calm content, and thought with a jealous pang, that you were not happy with me; that what you had given me was not love, but the dregs of the warm heart which had gone down under the waves with Ernest Haughton? I don't know how it came about, but so it was. With a wonderful aptitude for self-torment, I raked up all the circumstances, throwing over them the one color which distorted my own vision. And there grew up a strange coldness between us; I sought after solitude, that I might brood over my thoughts; and if at times you came near and I caught the look of wondering sorrow in your face I stifled the pang it gave me with the counter thought that it was a sorrow to which I could not minister if I would—a sorrow for the dead.

Why did you bear with me so long and patiently, never uttering one word of reproach? At first, indeed, you used to ask why I was moody and sad, but a cold answer, or a vehement one which you did not understand, sent you away silenced. And this mute forbearance only strengthened the idea that I was nothing to you. Foolish, then, if you like—and yet in that folly I was unutterably miserable. Miserable because you were so dear to me; because your very presence, or the touch of your hand, would send a thrill through every pulse, and yet I could do nothing to make you happy. I could do nothing but indulge bitterly the feeling that our marriage was a mistake, and you did not love me. What wonder if, day by day, you grew more distant and reserved, and I more gloomy, while the barrier between us strengthened? Ours was a strange honeymoon, was it not?

PANEL II.

I WAS sitting over the fire moodily, thinking as usual, wondering how long our life was to go on thus, and how it would end; wandering back again to my wild days among the Scottish hills, to the pile of old newspapers, and the tidings that sent me off through the pouring rain in search of you. My back was to the door, but when I heard it open gently I knew that you were there. You came and stood near me on the rug, and spoke, with your voice aroused from its usual passionless calm. For you see from the very first you have been so quiet, and my vehement nature craved something more demonstrative. I heard you then with the old thrill stirring my heart, and I traced unwonted excitement in your tone.

"A strange thing has happened," you said, "and I have come to tell you of it."

"Well, I am listening."

For a moment you hesitated, and then went on. And I saw that you held an open letter in your hand.

"My cousin Ernest was not drowned, as we believed. He and four of the crew were saved; they have been brought off one of the lone islands of the Pacific and are in England."

I never moved. Sitting there with your shadowy presence near me, my wife, I saw in the fire the first panel of my picture, and heard the voice of Ernest break in upon the Nuns' chorus. For you the sea gave back its dead, and for me what remained? But I knew that you expected me to say something, and I spoke, not in congratulation or rejoicing—I was not false enough for that.

"You must give your cousin a welcome," I said. "You will be glad to see him—of course he will come here."

You did not answer. I would not raise my face though I was conscious that you sought to read it. I could not meet that mournful inquiring look of yours which was wont to fill me with inexpressible tenderness.

You turned and went away silently, and left me to my musing. I hardly know what I thought or felt, or wished for. The jealous envy which had been growing up for Ernest dead, changed into disgust and hatred against Ernest living; and across it there came a mockery of gladness in your pleasure at seeing him again. I shunned you less at that time than usual, and could not keep from following you with my eyes compassionately, thinking how I was in the way forever, and but for me you might be happy.

You remember the day your cousin came. I got up a show of welcome; though lionized and feted as the hero of the wreck had been, he seemed more intolerable to me than ever. But you were gayer than usual; at dinner you talked lightly, with a make-believe, as I thought, of happiness before him. You were interested in his adventures, and drew him out; I alone sat silent and stupid. When you left us, I, holding open the door for you, ventured to look into your face. Its gayety was gone, and a wan, dreary exhaustion had come over it. I put my hand over my eyes for a moment, feeling that the table with its glasses and decanters reeled before them.

As I sat down your cousin cried out with a great outburst.

"What on earth is amiss with Ellen? She looks like the ghost of herself."

I battled with a quick pain at my heart and made some trivial answer. I hated the sight of his handsome face at my table.

"Ellen used to bear a great deal of persecution from me," he went on, holding up his glass to the light. "You know I was going to be married before that last trip, and when the affair was put off. I made a sort of 'scape-goat of Nelly, and bored her unmercifully. One woman doesn't often hear another praised as patiently as she did. The only time we ever quarrelled was about you, old fellow."

I carried my glass to my lips steadily and put it down untasted, but I could not trust my voice to speak.

"I dare say she has told you all about it. You know you were inclined to be ferocious at times, and I got a bad habit of calling you Ursa Major, etc. You needn't frown about it. The fact was I saw which way the wind blew, and couldn't resist the fun of having something to tease Nelly about in her turn. I had to be very humble before I got forgiven, and I knew then that Ellen was done for."

"Will you help yourself?" I said, breaking my silence suddenly. I should have liked to get up and shake hands with him, but for the thought that it might be dangerous.

"No more wine," said Ernest. "But if you have any place big enough to swing a cat in, where one might make a brute of oneself with a mild cigar—"

PANEL III.

I DON'T know how to paint it. You were sitting by the fire in the twilight, and your head was bent, with one hand shading your face and the other holding a book which you were not reading. Were you thinking then of the days gone by, and wondering at the dark spirit which had taken possession of your husband? Lights and shadows fell over your face from the fire, but its expression of sadness never changed. And I, knowing what I had been all this time; thinking of my blundering and folly; seeing it in its true light: how could I speak to you?

I don't know what I said, but I know that the first words of remorse and self-accusation brought your hand to cover my lips gently; and I know that I was happy then as I had never deserved to be: happy afterwards, even in confessing my madness, and hearing your tales of Ernest's infatuation about some one else: in watching the sorrowful look pass from your face, and its old brightness come back.

"But if it was about Ernest that I had been so—foolish, why did I always stop you when you spoke of him, instead of letting you tell me all?"

That was one of the questions I could not answer. But I should think that your cousin, when he came in from his mild cigar, must have imagined that dinner was a wonderful improver of Ursa Major's temper.

Are you there again, behind my chair? Well, I have finished the picture and you may look at it. I have had it in my mind's eye this many a day, and now it is done. There is one comforting reflection about it, viz., if it is true that all men are mad once in their lives, surely my time is over. You were too gentle with me; you should have called me to account instead of bearing all things so patiently. Never mind! we have learnt each other by heart now. One's first untried affection may be faulty and vacillating, but in spite of Sir Cresswell Cresswell, the holy love of married years does but grow firmer and deeper, and more indispensable as it loses its novelty. What do you say?

SOME of the English papers are complaining because Queen Victoria still accepts the $2,000,000 allowed her every year for her "reception entertainments," although she has given none for three years. One paper suggests that a portion of the salary ought to be returned.

THE world always receives talent with open arms, but often doesn't know what to do with genius.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XXII.

SCARCELY an hour had passed since the pure confession of Diana had rescued me from the embrace of delirium, when, as I went down into the drawing-room, M. de Maufert gazed at me steadfastly, and could not hide his surprise. I had overcome the demon; and, with pride on my forehead, and a smile on my lips like the Archangel, I was animated by the breath of God. My guardian turned quickly towards Diana, as if he divined that she alone had worked this miracle, and he glowered at both of us; but it was only for an instant.

Diana was pale, and agitated as if still trembling from the confession which had escaped from her heart; she scarcely dared raise her eyes.

"You are ready," said the Count dryly. "Do you go with me?"

"Excuse me, sir," I replied; "I have ordered Ralph to be saddled."

"Suit your own pleasure."

And resuming his disdainful impassibility, he seated himself out on the verandah, at a table covered with newspapers. I drew near Diana. "Take care!" said she; "he is watching us."

That word made my heart-strings tighten; it revealed the distress of her noble, proud soul. For the first time she trembled before her husband. My happiness oppressed me like a remorse.

A servant came and called M. de Maufert, and we were left alone. I was frightened by what I read in her mind. She quickly remarked my sadness.

"André," she said to me, "I am not well; but do not be worried at my sadness, for which there is henceforth no cause, since I now see you confident in yourself."

"Ah!" exclaimed I, "I would not be worthy of you if I did not know better."

She started; I continued:

"Pardon me for reviving your torments, but I wish to cure you. My sister, God sees, and judges us. Do you not feel above us the soul of my mother blessing us? There are affections that come to us from heaven. To-morrow I will leave here; and when you think of your brother, afar off, remember that he venerated you, and that you have saved him."

"Oh!" said she, ecstatically, "what are sorrows, what is life to me, if you only escape this misfortune? André, I have given my soul, and all I have to give, to you; and I have no regrets. Think of nothing but yourself, your future, and your happiness.

"What have I to fear now? By a single word you made me invulnerable. I defy madness to efface your memory from my heart. For there are my honor, my pride, and my reason!"

She gave me her hand.

"God be with us," continued she, with a divine smile, "and I will no longer fear. Adieu, my brother—thanks for that dear name!"

I started, overwhelmed with joy by this adieu; if I had remained I would have betrayed myself before my guardian.

Carried swiftly along by Ralph, I inhaled with delight the fragrant forest air; I felt as if born again, and it was with difficulty that I restrained my enthusiasm. Diana's love made me a god. On reaching the spot where I one day saw the spectre appear—"Where art thou, O phantom?" exclaimed I. "Here am I, and I brave thee!"

My past terrors awakened in my soul only a disdainful pity. I believed, I hoped. As the idolator before his idol, I was in an ecstacy; my eyes were lost in the blue heavens, infinite as my love. This trial to which I was prepared to submit, and which so terrified me, now seemed to me but as child's play. I was loved. . . .

I arrived at Granger's, radiant and transfigured. I would have hazarded one of those acts of heroism that love alone dares attempt. At seeing me, the good lawyer drew back in surprise, astonished to find me so joyous at this the most perilous hour of my life.

"Well, what is the matter, my friend?" said I, laughingly.

"By my faith, Baron," stammered he, "I am charmed to see you so. I was afraid—in fact, the affair is so solemn, and you have always appeared so grave, so pre-occupied—"

"That my pre-occupation has spoiled your eloquence," continued I, gaily. "Come! examine me, and persuade yourself that, for a madman, I am not much dejected."

"Bravo! I like this courageousness, and your affairs are on the high road to success; but remember, you have to plead before prejudiced judges. Our success depends on your coolness."

"Count on me, dear master; I am sustained by a belief that nothing can shake. Have the doctors arrived?"

"Yes, since morning; and I have seen them. There are two—Dr. Delatre and Dr. Pillant. Their great skill and high character relieve us from all fear."

Half an hour afterwards, in Granger's drawing-room, the members of the council were assembled, presided over by a Justice of the Peace. They were all seated near a table covered with green baize: at one end were two doctors, and the physician who had always attended me; at the other end my guardian. Opposite the president two seats were reserved for Granger and I.

The session began. M. de Maufert took the floor:

"Before commencing this debate, gentlemen, let me make a final effort towards conciliation. None of us ignore the serious consequences for my ward that may result from the rejection of an inopportune demand for emancipation, which my duty compels me to refuse for reasons which the interests of Andre himself oblige us to guard as secrets. It is impossible not to perceive in this imprudent proceeding an open indication of hostility against my administration. For yourselves, as well for me, this voyage to the East Indies, so suddenly projected, and which cannot be retarded six months, is but a maladroit pretext, which scarcely disguises a mistrust wounding to my pride. Things have come to such a point, that our family council will end in a Court of Justice, and painful dissensions will be divulged—or else an irreparable misfortune. This is why I thought I should be failing in my mission as guardian, if I did not make a final appeal to M. Granger. My name is, I think, a sufficient reply to the calumnies that have been directed against me. Let my ward withdraw his demand and I will renounce an inquest that may be fatal to him."

Granger was going to reply; I prevented him. "Permit me to speak, my friend," said I, "as I am here for them to decide on the clearness of my mind."

A gesture of the Justice of the Peace encouraged me. I continued:

"It would not suit well with my age, gentlemen, to reject the overtures of conciliation that the Count de Maufert, my guardian, has just uttered, and I will answer his frankness, not by longer intrenching myself behind what he calls a maladroit pretext, but in confiding myself to his good faith. A man in his pay has dared to declare me mad. Let my guardian protest against this calumny. I will submit respectfully to his wish, and will await with confidence the hour of my majority."

At the silence in the assembly which succeeded this, it was easy to see that with the first blow I had touched the heart of the question.

M. de Maufert hesitated an instant, but it was not possible for him to draw back.

"My duty and the care of your future," said he, at last, darting at me a spiteful look, "prevented me from protesting."

"In that case, sir," I replied, calmly, "pardon me if I maintain my pretensions. I should not leave this room, except independent and reinstated, or else despoiled of all my rights. I insist upon this examination invoked by you; and placing myself under the protection of my family council, I pray them from this day to regulate my future, which you now menace."

"Do you persist in your assertions, Count?" said the Justice of the Peace, addressing himself to my guardian. "Shall I read the document on which you have founded your refusal of the emancipation solicited by the Baron?"

"I persist, sir," replied the Count.

The Judge then took from the table a voluminous manuscript and commenced reading. First was a brutal account of the misfortune which weighed down our family for two generations. Following this were the physicians' certificates attesting to the madness of my grandfather and my mother. At this cruel picture the magistrate hesitated.

"These are sad recollections for you, sir," said he to me; "and if you desire to retire, your presence is not indispensable."

"The memory of a mother can only strengthen my heart," replied I. "Continue."

He then continued this heart-rending recital of my first sorrows. My mother's death was narrated with its train of horrors and anguish; then, this melancholy chapter closed, the biography took up the record of my actions. In the commencement it was a tissue of insignificant and odd facts, woven from the forgotten memories of my earliest childhood, and gathered together day by day with such care, that one could trace in their collation a long-premeditated plan for entailing upon me a loss of my civil position. I could not repress a disdainful smile at this singular catalogue, where my disobediences as a school-boy, my caprices as a youth, my hours of gayety and those of sadness were numbered as so many symptoms of madness. My foolish enterprises as a student had their turn. M. de Maufert knew them all; he had his police at Heidelberg. This extravagant libel was worded with so much art that, in listening to it, I finished by being myself astonished: the eccentricities of my youth multiplied, exaggerated and coldly repeated, seemed enormities to me. But there was not a single circumstance in my life that I had not found myself under the influence or the memory of Diana: her image hovered over all these recollections of the past; one single thought triumphed in me—I was loved! And when the venomous pages began the chronicle of the last few months, every hour of which were counted by the palpitations of our hearts, I closed my eyes, dazzled by my thoughts. I saw again the rivulet which wept over my fainting godmother, the woodcutter's cabin, and all those radiant days when we were both silent, fearful, and alarmed at the trouble in our souls.

I scarcely heard that my guardian decided that my mind was in a troubled state, testified to by witnesses that were ready to appear before the council; I listened only to a voice that murmured in my charmed ear: "André, je vous aime, voulez vous encore mourir?" I was startled from my ecstasy by these words, addressed to me by the Justice of the Peace:

"The witness called, being in the pay of the Count, cannot be heard except for references, sir; nevertheless, you have a right to object to that."

"God forbid, sir," exclaimed I. "I have the greatest interest in having this inquiry full and entire, and nothing left in doubt."

Martin, the valet de chambre of M. de Maufert, first on the list, was then brought in. Of all the servants at the chateau this was the one most hostile to me, for I knew him to be too far in the good graces of his master not to mistrust, and I always treated him accordingly. Interrogated by the magistrate he swore to have known me from infancy; he always observed little peculiarities of character—sudden angers—such as crazy people always have; but it was since my return from Heidelberg that my infirmity had characterized itself. He then related all he knew of the famous story of the forest—the day when one of my mad fits nearly cost the Countess her life; then the scene with Guillot and Placide; and, at last, the evening when my guardian, forced to call to his servants for help, only owed his safety to the violence of my rage, which made me lose all consciousness. Another valet testified to the same. Then came a workman—a friend of Placide's—who repeated that my madness was well known in the village, and assured them of having seen me, the evening before, dance on the village square, and the moment afterwards pursue them like a madman.

"Have you no objections to make to this testimony?" the magistrate demanded of me.

"None at all," replied I, disdainfully. Tony, one of my grooms, was called. This boy was devoted to me, and I was surprised to see him there. Intimidated by the assembly, and embarrassed with his broken French, Tony jabbered away about my equestrian talents—my knowledge of horseflesh—when the Judge interrupted him.

"You were with the Baron the day when the Countess was thrown from her horse near the Wild Boar's Glen?"

"Yes, your honor," said Tony with a long breath.

"Tell what you know about this affair."

"Your honor, the horse is a good beast, it is not his fault; but it worried him to be held back; so he slipped off and ran away—"

Did the Baron have the appearance of a man seized with madness?"

"I beg pardon, your honor, but the Baron is too good a rider to be frightened; he is a gentleman."

"So you affirm," continued the judge, "that the Baron seemed perfectly cool at the moment, and according to you, the Baron went off quickly because his horse ran off with him?"

"I can affirm it," replied the groom. "I know very well that he often has attacks, saving your presence—that was told to me as it was to the others."

"By whom?"

"By Placide."

"Pardon me," interrupted Granger, "I desire that the witness explain to me what he means by: 'That was told to me as it was to the others?' Who are the others?"

"Those who were to testify," replied Tony, naively. "M. Placide told us what to say, as only he saw the Baron in his hours of madness."

My guardian bit his moustache impatiently.

"There is no sense in all this," said he.

"Permit me," said Granger. "The role of this steward who dictates testimony is of good right suspicious, and we have a right to know if there was not some pressure or menace—

"Oh, no, sir!" said Tony; "M. Placide did not threaten me; on the contrary he promised me two hundred francs more than my wages for saying as he told me."

My guardian sprang from his chair.

"It is false," he exclaimed, "and it is nonsense."

"I will observe to the Count," replied Granger, calmly, "that his steward alone is in the case; the same Placide who is at the bottom of all the rumors spread abroad against us; who has defamed us before a Court; who alone has seen us during our pretended attacks, and whose hatred is so evident that they haven't dared bring him before us—"

"Enough, enough," said I, rising in my turn; "such a discussion as this will weaken my cause."

At a sign from the Judge, Tony withdrew.

"I protest, energetically, against this testimony," said my guardian.

"The council will decide on its value," replied Granger. "We now request that the doctors commence their examination, and we will await their decision before pleading our cause or stating our demands."

This terrible ordeal, that I had so much feared, was no longer anything but child's-play for me; the time was come to overthrow all calumnies. To the timid questions first addressed me by the doctors, I replied sharply and boldly.

"Oh, do not treat me as a frightened child," exclaimed I, proudly. "I can easily submit myself to your inspection, and can even aid you in your examination of the condition of my brain. Shall I reply to this wordy pamphlet that you have just heard, or to this venal or sincere testimony? Not one fact is conclusive. One among you has seen me sick with fever, and delirious; but you practitioners do not ignore that this fever would probably have saved me had I then had disease of the brain. Let us, then, leave the past. Monomania does not show itself by any physical symptoms, I know; so it is only in my mental condition that you can look for traces of insanity, partial or intermittent. You tremble at the idea of placing me face to face with my madness? Well, I will go ahead of you in your investigations. I will enter those horrible regions with you without flinching. I am mad, they say, or I will be mad, because this fearful inheritance is in the family for two generations. Question me, gentlemen; I am ready."

"Have you never felt any uneasiness, knowing yourself to be threatened by such a misfortune?" asked Dr. Delatre.

For an instant I thought of eluding this question; but I remembered Diana, and I blushed at the idea of a falsehood.

"I have been frightened, I avow," replied I bitterly, "because I wished to know the dangers that I ran. I have read all your Essays on Madness, and for long hours I have weighed my strength and weakness against each other. That was torture to me; but you see my faculties have not been injured by the trial. Here before you—you who are assembled to judge me, perhaps to declare me mad—I speak with calmness of the terrible curse by which I am menaced, and my mind does not fail me, even when I know that an imprudent word can lose all. Do you imagine that my madness arises from other causes? Well, at the same time that I defend my honor, I defend my fortune; and you see that I speak of it with a disdainful smile, for I am only twenty, gentleman. They have told you of my follies as a student. Ah! those follies I confess to them, I believed in youth in enthusiasm for my country, as I still believe in poetry, in virtue and in love—in love which alone can save me on earth as in eternity—in love which defies the obscure phantoms of madness, for it is light, and truth, and life itself. Yes, I have sometimes felt the attacks of fear, as one feels himself drowning at the recital of a shipwreck. I have fought—I have suffered—what more shall I say? I am twenty years old; I love and am loved. So you see that I cannot be mad."

A murmur ran through the assembly; the coldest were moved by the breath of my passion, and I read on all their faces encouragement and belief. My guardian appeared confounded. My victory was sure, and hovering over me was the image of Diana smiling encouragingly.

"Ah," continued I, carried away by my feelings, "I have my reason—not that reason of the mind which stumbles at each step along the unexplored pathways of science and philosophy, but that religion of the heart which takes its force from God, and guides us with sure steps in the ways of eternal wisdom and of eternal beauty. Do you not see on my forehead its divine mark? I am no longer the feeble being of yesterday, who, blinded by doubt, struggled with his terror, seeking a gleam of hope in the darkness of his mind. She said to me, 'I love you;' light burst upon me in a flood, and I see."

I was on my feet, trembling with a holy excitement. They watched me, breathless.

"Take care!" said Granger to me, in a low tone.

"Let him go on!" exclaimed my guardian, quickly.

But I scarcely heard them. "No," continued I vehemently, turning towards the Count; "No, you cannot stifle my reason under your accursed fears; the miseries of this world are dispersed before me. The baptism of love has brought me from the hell into which you wished to precipitate me. Ah! you do not see the adored image which assists and protects me; we are but as one soul. She is there—my eyes behold her; I feel her breath, her voice murmurs in my ear the words which render me invulnerable."

"He raves! he raves! You hear him!" vociferated M. de Maufert.

"I rave!" replied I, with superb contempt, "I rave! Ah! he betrays himself; you can no longer call me crazy. His jealousy attests that I am loved."

"Hush! hush!" exclaimed Granger.

"He is mad," said my guardian, angrily; "you see, gentlemen, that this is a crazy fit."

The doctors surrounded me; I struggled with them. I saw Diana, pale and weeping. I heard a plaintive sob escape her lips.

"Let me go! let me go!" exclaimed I; "she is watching you!"

"He is mad!" repeated the Count.

"Do not listen to him," said I, "he lies."

And I tried to rush towards him; they seized me. A prey to indignation I resisted with superhuman power. "Villains! you will kill her!" said I, feeling my strength failing me.

It was horrible. Diana had taken refuge in my arms; they bruised her in their struggles. I saw the tears flowing from her eyes, and the beatings of her heart suffocated me.

"It is a hallucination," said one of the doctors.

This word penetrated my brain like a red-hot iron: the elasticity of my will gave way, a cloud enveloped me. Diana disappeared, uttering a loud cry, and I fell on the sofa—inert, captive, and lost.

I felt something cool on my forehead; they were bathing my temples with water. I heard their remarks, indistinctly, as of people speaking at a distance.

"The attack is not dangerous," said Dr. Pillant; "it was caused by one of those violent mental shocks to which monomaniacs are so liable."

"There is a bed in the next room," said Granger.

They carried me there hastily, and laid me down, my head resting on one of the cushions. I was conscious that some one unbuttoned my coat and untied my cravat; then the noise died away little by little, and soon all this worry of my mind was succeeded by a profound sleep.

CORNER WINDOW MUSINGS.

MY friends, do you smoke pipes? I don't imagine my lady readers do, but perhaps some of the other fellows who glance at this, may. I don't mean a common, vulgar pipe, in the usual acceptance of the word, but a rare old meerschaum that has been an heir-loom in some old family on the Rhine—that has, as Billy Birch says, shrivelled up half a dozen old fellows, who have labored with it for years—an ancient piece of mahogany-colored "foam of the sea," which you acquired, after long reflection on the expense of cigars and their general indifferent quality. Your pipe cost you fifty dollars, and your choice Oronoko a dollar and a half a pound. It is cheaper than cigars, even then. With such a pipe carefully loaded, with your tobacco nicely scented with a Manila bean, the amber mouth-piece between your lips, your body settled in the depths of an easy chair, and your feet, at the angle of Yankee luxury, above your head, what a picture of comfort "mortal man" presents, as the smoke curls in cloudy rings and floats away in misty vapor! You feel at peace with "all the world and the rest of mankind." If there be any period of the twenty-four hours that you could be induced to loan a friend five dollars, it is then. It is a moment when strong-minded women with tickets for the Fair of the Christian Commission could overcome your oft-repeated resolutions to say "no," and wheedle the coin from your purse. We men have our little weaknesses, and our weak moments, when we are as plastic and as pliable as the clay in the hands of the potter; and at such times we are passive victims of woman's persuasive ways—very lambs led to the slaughter. If feminine humanity would only study our ways, our means would be at their command, and many a new bonnet would grace the Opera, and perhaps a camel's hair shawl would be exhibited on Montgomery street as certificates of our amiability. Let all womandom make a note on't.

From my cosy corner window I look down on Montgomery street, and muse upon the busy scene, watching the throng of passers-by and—must I confess it?—giving more heed to the pretty faces and graceful figures of the sex called "fair" than to the other less interesting objects that constitute the moving panorama before me. And what a variety of creatures and styles one sees! And some are, oh, how "stunning!" What saucy, jaunty hats—what "loud" patterns of cloaks the present fashions run to! Every woman looks like a princess in disguise; and yet how charming! what a heavy draft must there have been upon the birds of the sandy desert of Africa for all these feathers; what consternation among the ostriches, the peacocks, the turkey-cocks, at this demand upon those tails which they can no more unfold. I am thankful that I am not an ostrich. The women retaliate upon us and quote our "peg-tops" and our big sleeves. They don't know that our sleeves are made large that we may laugh therein at their follies. We will keep the secret.

The shopkeepers complain that their stocks do not diminish as of old, because of the fall in the stocks of Washoe. There is truth, sad truth, in that. Many a camel's hair remains upon their shelves that would have been aired in Montgomery street except for that. Who can buy shawls and silks with Gould and Curry down to a thousand? Ophir at five hundred allows point lace to remain in a state of suspense like the violin of Uncle Edward. If the dust don't come down, how can the people come down with the dust for all these accessories to the human feminine form divine? It can't be done. There is a point where forbearance ceases to be a virtue, and that is, when one's dividends take the form of assessments. It is a rule in all well-regulated households that the head of the establishment, when he comes home late from the club, is allowed to swear when the third match fails. There is a time to weep, and a time to pray, and a time to ejaculate on your fate and consign mines and mining stocks to greater depths than the deepest shaft; and that is, when these Irish dividends come upon you like a summer thunder-shower, throwing a damper on your spirits and making all things on earth look blue.

What is a man, then, who does not smoke? How can he regain his equanimity without that solace? I don't think he can. Smoking is the safety-valve that lets off his pent-up ire and brings him to a proper sense of his duty to himself and mankind at large.

People who do not attend the opera at Maguire's have no idea how much they lose. The company is really a good one, and one can pass a very pleasant evening listening to the charming voice of Miss Richings. She is a capital actress as well, and how tastefully she dresses! A friend of mine has pretty much given up all other business, and I've a settled conviction that he has Richings on the brain. The disease has become chronic and he has bought out the boy several times who sells her cartes de visite. It is my firm belief that he will run plumb through his fortune in extravagance. I am glad to see that the house is respectably filled every evening and the principal members of the troupe are becoming decided favorites with the public, filling the void left by Squires and Escott, whose departure from us we mourned and whose memories we cherished faithfully for two years. I was going to say something about the opera, but THE CALIFORNIAN has imported a critic from France for the express purpose of writing about English operas. Some outsider, writing about the troupe and things, seems to run considerably on Peakes and calls him his "Baby Lablache." Peakes is a pretty healthy style of a baby, and would make the berth of a dry nurse no sinecure.

That drop curtain has taxed my poor brain, in common with others, and muddled all my theories of its allegorical characteristics. The Chariot evidently was never copied from a Brewster "Trotter," or one of George Kimball's "thoroughbraces." I have seen a similar vehicle drawn about the Sanchez ranch, of Mexican origin. The most expressive face in the group is that of the tiger a young lady is trying to sit still on, but making a poor show of equestrianism, while the Royal Bengal looks out upon the audience with an expression which seems to say: "Do you see this?—do you see the load they are trying to come over me? Fun is fun: but I'll be hanged if I stand this blamed nonsense any longer!" I have watched for the denouement every night, and as "strikes" are the order of the day, I have waited for a demonstration on the part of that tiger that will make that man in the orchestra jump into his bass viol for safety. That tiger is dangerous—his looks show it—and I call upon Maguire to "take him out," or there will be a scene of base viol-ence. I suppose it is intended to represent the Millennium—perhaps it was painted by Miller, and, like the originator's calculations, there is a little error in the figures. You may see a nigger in the fence on the right, with a white piccaninny on his back, illustrating the beauties of miscegenation.

I had something else to say, but a lady going by sees me at the window and beckons me to join her. I know she is going shopping, and as that occupation is a favorite one of mine, I go.

RESTLESS.

BRIEF MENTION.

THE NOTTING HILL MYSTERY.

SECTION V.

1.—Memorandum from Mr. Henderson.

WE have now reached a point in this mysterious story at which I must again direct your attention most particularly to the coincidences of dates etc., on which, indeed, depends entirely, as I have before said, the only solution at which I have found it possible to arrive.

The length to which these depositions have run has obliged me to divide them into distinct sections, each of which should bear more directly upon some particular phase of the case. For this purpose I have taken, as you will have perceived, first the early history of Mrs. Anderton, and as we may, I think, fairly assume, of Mme. R. also, thus establishing, at the outset, the initiatory link of that chain of connection between these two extraordinary cases, which, inexplicable as either is in itself, will, nevertheless, I cannot but imagine, each help to elucidate each other. The second division placed us in possession of the histories both of Mrs. Anderton, and Mme. R., up to the point at which the thread of their singular destinies crossed; showing, also, how the Baron became aware of his wife's probable relationship to Mrs. Anderton, and of the benefit thereby accruing to her upon the death, without issue, of her sister and Mr. Anderton. The third section deals with the first illness of Mme. R., to the date and circumstances of which I feel it right to direct your most particular attention.

In the fourth division of the evidence we then reviewed the circumstances attending the fatal illness of Mrs. Anderton, which led to her husband's arrest on suspicion of murder, and finally to his suicide, while awaiting investigation. A considerable portion of the evidence connected with this phase of the subject I have thought it best to keep back for insertion in that division of the case which bears more particularly upon the conduct and death of Mr. Anderton, and which will follow that on which we are now about to enter. The narrative, therefore, of Mrs. Anderton's last illness has been thus far confined to the mention of it in the unfortunate lady's own diary, with the note at its termination, in which her husband records the fact of her decease. With this, however, I have coupled an account drawn partly from an earlier portion of the same diary, and partly from the statement of the medical man by whom she was at the time attended, of a previous illness very similar in general character to that by which she was finally carried off, and apparently of an equally unaccountable description. The object with which I have thus placed in juxtaposition the first attacks respectively of Mme. R. and Mrs. Anderton will probably be sufficiently apparent. I have now to direct your attention to a second illness of Mme. R., occurring, under what I cannot but feel to be most suspicious circumstances, but a very few months before her demise.

In proceeding with this portion of the case, the extreme importance attaching to a thorough and correct appreciation of the dates of the various occurrences will become more obvious at every step, and to them I must again request your utmost attention. I had at first proposed to submit to you in a tabular form the singular coincidences to which I allude, but on reflection, such a course appeared objectionable, as tendering to place too strongly before you a view of the subject with which I must confess myself thoroughly dissatisfied. I have, therefore, preferred leaving entirely to yourselves the comparison of the various dates, etc., limiting myself strictly to a verification of accuracy. In many instances this has been no easy task, and more particularly in establishing satisfactorily the exact date (5th April, 1855), at which the symptoms of Mme. R.'s second illness first appeared, wherein I have experienced a difficulty only compensated by the importance of the result.

I have, therefore, to request that the depositions here following may be carefully compared with the concluding portions of Mrs. Anderton's diary, and also with the statement of Dr. Dodsworth. In making this comparison you will notice, besides the points I have already referred to respecting dates, various discrepancies between facts as actually occurring and as represented to Mr. and Mr. Anderton by the Baron. These I need not hardly particularize, as they will be sufficiently obvious on a perusal of the depositions themselves, but it is as well to draw your attention generally to them, as they seem to have a significant bearing upon other parts of the case.

I must request you also to bear in mind the relation in which the Baron and his wife were supposed to stand towards each other previously to their marriage, and will now proceed to lay before you the depositions relating, as I have said, to the second illness of the latter.

2. Statement of Mrs. Brown.

My name is Jane Brown. I am a widow, and my poor dear husband was a clerk in the city. I don't know in whose house. I did know but I forget. My memory is very bad. I live in Russell Place. The house is my own, not hired. My poor dear husband left it to me in his will. I sometimes let it off in lodgings. Not always. Only when I can get quiet lodgers. Last year I let the first and second floors to Baron R. The ground floor was let to Dr. Marsden. He has had it several years. He does not live there. He has a practice near London. He comes to Russell Place every Monday and Friday to see his patients. He used to live with us. That was in my poor dear husband's lifetime. Baron R. took the rest of the house except the attics. I lived there myself. I cannot remember when the Baron came. It was some time in February or March. I am sure I cannot remember. I have no means of ascertaining. I don't keep any accounts. My poor dear husband always kept the accounts. I have kept none since he died. I dare say I lose money by it, but I can't help it. I have no head for it. I am pretty sure it was in February or March. I think it was about the beginning of March. [Clearly so. The Baron was in Dublin on the 25th of February.—R. H.] There was no other lodger then. Not till my son went away from home again. He was away from home then. He came home some time in March or April. I suppose it was in March. He came from Melbourne to Liverpool. He was at home for some weeks. I can't tell how many. He went away again in April, or it might have been May. I am almost sure it was not later than May; not so late I think. Mrs. Troubridge could tell you. Richard married her daughter. Richard is my son. He married Ellen Troubridge. That was while he was at home last year. They had been engaged ever so long. He came home on purpose to marry her. He had got a promise of something at Melbourne, and was obliged to go back directly. He worked his passage home from Melbourne. I do not know what ship he came in. I don't think he shipped in his own name. I forget why it was. Something about not having it known. I don't know why not. I don't know what name he took. I can't remember when he came home or when he went. I do not know when he left Melbourne. He brought home one paper. There is only a small piece of it left. He was with me all the time he was at home except Saturdays and Sundays. He used to go down to Brighton then to see Ellen. She was in a shop there. He used to go by the excursion train and stay with her mother from Saturday to Monday. All the rest of the time he was with me. That is all I can tell you about him. The other lodger was a friend of his. He had known him in Australia. He asked him to his wedding. That was at our house. It was on Monday and he came the Saturday before. They all came up together from Brighton. The Baron let us use his rooms. He went away somewhere to give his lady change of air. I think it was because she had been ill. I cannot be sure. She was ill several times at my house. She died there. I forget when was the first time she was ill there. It was while my son was in England. I remember talking to him about it. He was away from home at the time. There was no one in the house but myself. I remember it because I was so frightened. There was nobody at all. Not even a servant. I was without one then for two or three months. I got a charwoman to come in the day. The reason was my servant got tipsy. She had to be taken away by the police and I was afraid for a long time to get another. I can't at all remember when that was. I think it must have been before the Baron came. I can't be sure. I am quite sure it was before Mme. R. was taken ill. I am sure of that, because I remember so well how frightened I was. I think Dr. Marsden attended Mme. R. He used to be very friendly with the Baron. Everybody liked him; he was so good-natured and so very kind to his wife. We did not think so much of her. She was very quiet, but did not seem to care about him. She seemed frightened like. I sometimes thought she was not quite right in her head. The Baron was always kind to her. He was good natured with everybody. I never heard him say a hard word of any one but once. That was of young Aldridge. He was Richard's friend who lodged with us.* He made a noise and disturbed Mme. R. He came home one night quite intoxicated, and the Baron asked me to give him notice. He said if Mr. Aldridge did not go he must. Of course I gave him notice directly. He said it was all spite. Of course I knew that was not true. He said he was not drunk, but the policeman found him lying on the doorstep. I forgot what he said. It was some foolish story about the Baron. I do not know of any reason why they should have quarrelled. I remember he said something once about Mme. R. walking in her sleep. I dont know what it was. I don't think that could have anything to do with it. Of course it could not. The Baron complained of being disturbed. That was all. I do not remember that I was ever disturbed myself. His room was next to mine. I might have been disturbed without remembering it. I certainly was that night he came home intoxicated. He might have disturbed Mme. R. and I slept through it. I sleep heavy sometimes. I forget when this was and when he left the house. I cannot remember the exact dates of anything. My poor dear husband always did everything of that sort for me. He was a very exact man. I have no sort of books or papers of any kind to which I could refer. This is all I can tell you about it.

3. Statement of Mrs. Troubridge.

My name is Ellen Troubridge. My husband is a seafaring man. He is captain of a small collier. We live at Shoreham, near Brighton. I have one daughter, whose name is Ellen. She is married to a man of the name of Richard Brown. He is in Australia. He went out to Australia in 1856. I forget the exact date. It was some time in April or May. The ship's name was the Maria Somes; she sailed from Gravesend. My daughter was married on the 14th of April; that was not long before they sailed. She had been engaged to young Brown for three or four years. He came home on purpose to marry her. I don't remember exactly when he came home. It must have been about a month before; something of that kind. He was in a great hurry to get out again. He wanted to marry by license, so as to be quicker, but I told him it was a foolish expense. He had the banns put up the first Sunday he was at home. I think it was the first, but cannot be quite sure. My daughter was then in service; she was at a shop in Brighton. During the week she used to sleep at a friend's house, and on Saturdays she used to come home to us for Sundays. Brown used always to come down on Saturdays. He used to come by the cheap excursion train. He used to go to Brighton and call for Nelly, and walk with her to Shoreham. He used to walk back with her early Monday morning, and go on to town. He never came at other times; it was no good; Nelly was only at home Sundays. He wanted her to leave and go to his mother's. She would not leave the shop till her time was out. I would not let him be at Brighton; I was afraid people might talk. So far as I know, he was at home all the rest of the time. The marriage took place from Mrs. Brown's house. She had a lodger then—a foreigner, I think. He went out of town for two or three days, and lent her his rooms. After the wedding young Brown and my daughter went to Southend for a few days. I cannot say exactly how long; about a week or a fortnight. On the Saturday before they sailed we all went down to Gravesend to meet them and see them off. The ship was to have sailed on the Sunday. We all went to Rosherville, and slept at Gravesend that night. I had some friends there who gave us beds. Mrs. Brown went back on Sunday, but I stayed. A young man by the name of Aldridge was with us. He was a friend of Brown's. I did not much like him. He went back with Mrs. Brown. I think he took lodgings in her house. I cannot call to mind the exact day young Brown came home. I think it must have been some time in March.

4. Statement of Dr. Marsden.

My name is Anthony Marsden. I am a physician, and formerly resided at Mrs. Brown's house, in Russell Place. Some three or four years ago I found the atmosphere of London beginning to tell upon my health, and determined to remove into the suburbs. I bought a small practice in the neighborhood of St. John's Wood, and gave up the greater portion of my London patients. I was, however, desirous of not altogether relinquishing that connection, and with this object rented two rooms at Mrs. Brown's, where I might be consulted by such patients as I still retained in that neighborhood. I used to drive up for this purpose every Monday and Thursday morning. I had been doing this for some time, when the first and second floor apartments were taken by the Baron R. I did not at first much like him. I thought him an imposter. He seemed, however, to wish to make my acquaintance, and I found that he was, at all events, a very highly-informed man on all matters of science. We had frequent conversations respecting mesmerism. He certainly seemed to be himself a believer in it. Were I not myself thoroughly satisfied of its impossibility, I am not at all sure but that he might have convinced me on the subject. I am quite unable to account for many of the phenomena exhibited. They were, however, of course, to be accounted for in some way. He seemed a very excellent chemist, and we used at times to pursue our investigations together. There was a small room at the back of the house, on the basement floor, which he used as a laboratory. He invited me to make use of it, and I was frequently there. He was always engaged in experiments of one kind or another, and had various ingenious projects in hand. In the laboratory was a large assortment of chemicals and medicines of various kinds. In the case of poor patients, I have sometimes asked him to make up a prescription, and he has done so. At the time at which I knew him he was engaged in a series of experiments on the metals, and more especially on mercury, antimony, lead and zinc. I think he must have had almost every preparation of these that is made. I believe that his researches were for the purpose of finding a specific against the disease so prevalent among painters, which is known by the name of "lead colic." The laboratory was at the back of the house, and quite detached from all the other rooms. There was an open space between it and the rest of the house, with only a passage communicating with the offices. This passage had a glass door, and there was a wooden door at the end into the laboratory. Both these doors were always kept closed. They were not usually locked. I told the Baron I thought they should be, but he he said no one would go there. He had a weight put on the laboratory door to close. The glass door had a spring already. I frequently made use of his laboratory: sometimes when he was absent. I might go there with or without him whenever I pleased. There was no attempt at concealing from me anything whatever that was done there. It was all quite open. I attended Mme. R. through the greater part of her illness. It was a very long affair, and of a very singular character. I cannot be at all certain as to the date at which it commenced. I was not regularly called in at the time, and did not notice it in my book. The Baron only consulted me in a friendly way about it, two or three days afterwards. It was certainly as much as that. I think it was the third day. I cannot be sure of that, but I am quite sure it was at least the second. By being the second day, I mean that at least one clear day had intervened between the night on which she was ill and the day on which I was consulted by the Baron. I cannot swear to more than one, but I think it must have been. From what the Baron told me of the symptoms, I remember concluding it to be a case of the English cholera, but she was almost recovered at the time I first heard of it, and I did not prescribe for her. About a fortnight or three weeks after this she had another slight attack, for which the Baron himself also prescribed. He acquainted me on my visit to town with the course he had pursued, and I entirely concurred in his treatment of the case. The attack, however, returned, I think, more than once, and he then asked me to see and prescribe for her. I first saw her professionally on the 23d of May, 1856*. This was two days after he third or fourth attack, which occurred on the night of the 21st of May. As soon as I regularly took up her case, I made notes of it in my diary. Extracts from this are enclosed (vide 5, herewith,) showing the progress of the case from time to time. I attended her throughout her illness. The attacks occurred, as will be seen from my diary, about every fortnight. They increased in intensity up to the 10th of October, 1856. At this time she was apparently, for three or four days, almost in articulo mortis, and I was unable to hold any hope of her recovery. Another attack would certainly have been fatal. Happily the disease appeared to have spent itself, and at the expiration of the fortnight no renewal of the more acute symptoms was experienced. From this date Mme. R. progressed steadily but slowly to convalescence, and would no doubt have ultimately entirely recovered, but for the unfortunate accident which put an end to her life. Mme. R's case was one of great difficulty. It was apparently one of chronic gastritis; but its recurrence in an acute form at stated intervals was a very abnormal incident. The case presented, in fact, all the more prominent features of that of chronic antimonial poisoning recorded by Dr. Mayerhofer in Heller's Archiv., 1846, and alluded to by Professor Taylor in his work on Poisons, p. 539. There were also strong points of general resemblance to the other cases of McMullen and Hardman, quoted by Professor Taylor at the same page, and recorded in Guy's Hospital Reports for October, 1857. As matters progressed, I took the opportunity of pointing this out as delicately as I could to the Baron, and asked if he had any suspicions of foul play. He seemed at first almost amused by the suggestion; but upon further consultation was inclined to take a graver view of the matter. We went carefully through the cases in question, the Baron translating that of Dr. Mayerhofer for my benefit, as I was not a German scholar. At his suggestion, we determined to analyse the various excretions, etc., and an examination was accordingly instituted in the Baron's laboratory. He was always very particular in keeping up the supply of medicine, and would never allow the bottles, etc., to be thrown away. There was therefore some remnant of every medicine that had been made up for her. these we tested carefully, as well as the excreta, etc., both for arsenic and for antimony, but without finding the slightest trace of either. The analysis was conducted by the Baron, who took the greatest interest in it. I could not, perhaps, have done it myself. Such matters have not come within my line of practice. In such a case I should certainly not trust to my own manipulations. I trusted to those of the Baron, because I knew him to be an expert practical chemist, and in the daily habit of such operations. My own share in them was limited to the observation of results, and their comparison with those pointed out by Professor Taylor. I did not take any special pains to ascertain the purity of the chemical tests employed, or of their being in fact what they assumed to be. That is to say, when a colorless liquid with all the apparent characteristics of nitric acid was taken from a bottle labelled "Nit. Ac." I took for granted that nitric acid was being employed, similarly, of course, with the other chemical agents. It never occurred to me to do otherwise. Nor did I take any especial precautions to identify the matters examined. Others might certainly have been substituted; but if so it must have been done by the Baron himself. It was, perhaps, possible that he might have conducted his investigations under such supervision as I then exercised with fictitious tests, and it was quite so to substitute other matters and mislead me by subjecting them to a real analysis. That is to say, this would have been possible to be done by the Baron. No one else could, under the circumstances, have done it, or at least without his direct connivance. I had no ground for any suspicion of the kind, nor do I see any now. I think it most unwarrantable. Every circumstance that came under my notice goes equally to contravene such a supposition. The Baron was devotedly attached to his wife: he supplied her liberally with professional advice, as also with nurses, medicine, and every necessary; his care for her led him to precautions which, in their incidental results, must have inevitably exposed any attempt at the administration of poison. During the severer period of the disorder, he had no opportunity of attempting such a crime, as he universally insisted on both food and medicines being both prepared and administered by the nurses; he himself rendered every assistance in the endeavor to detect any such attempt when its possibility had been suggested by myself; and lastly, Mme. R. did not die, although the investigation had already removed all suspicion. I think such an imputation wholly unwarranted and unwarrantable from any one circumstance of the case.

6. Memorandum by Mr. Henderson.

From the very vague nature of the foregoing evidence, so far as dates are concerned, it was, as you will at once perceive, no very easy task to determine the precise day of Madame R.'s first attack. To the view of the case, however, which I was even then inclined to adopt this was a matter of the last importance, and I determined to spare no effort to elucidate it, if possible, from the very loose data furnished by the depositions. In this I have, I think, been successful; but as the process has been somewhat complicated, I must ask you to follow me through it step by step.

The difficulty of tracing the truth seemed at first sight not a little augmented by the fact that no one had been in the house but Mrs. Brown herself, whose memory, even had it afforded any clue, could not have been relied on. On further consideration, however, I began to fancy myself mistaken in this respect, and finally conceived a hope that this very fact might, if properly handled, prove an assistance instead of an obstacle to my investigation. The following was the course of reasoning I pursued.

There are only two points on which Mrs. Brown appears to be certain—her son's presence in England, and her being herself alone in the house on the actual day in question. The only chances of success, therefore, seemed to be: First, in ascertaining precisely the limit of time within which such a combination was possible; and, second, in determining by a process of elimination the actual day or days on which such a combination could fall.

The result has been far more complete than at the outset of the investigation I could venture to hope.

1st. For the period of time to which our researches should be directed.

This was obviously limited by the residence of Richard Brown in England, and my first efforts were therefore directed towards determining the exact dates of his arrival and departure.

1. On inquiry at Liverpool, I found that the only vessels that arrived from Melbourne during the month of March, 1856, were as follows:

Ship.	Captain.	Owners.	Arrived.
James Baines	McDonald	Jas. Baines & Co.	4th March
Lightning	Enright		24th "
Emma	Underwood	Pilkington Bros.	27th "

Of these the James Baines left Melbourne on the 28th November, and the Lightning on the 28th December. The exact date of sailing of the Emma I have not been able to ascertain, but it is immaterial to the case.

The fragment of newspaper preserved by Mrs. Brown has no date, nor could I at first find any clue by which it might be determined. The last paragraph, however, commences as follows:

Seasonable Weather?—The thermometer has, for the last four days, never been lower than eighty degrees in the shade. We wonder what our friends in England would say to singing their Ch . . . rols in such a . . . . .

The remainder is torn off, but the missing syllables are clearly Christmas Carols, and this shows clearly that the paper must have been published after the departure of the James Baines on the 28th November. Richard Brown must therefore have come home either in the Lightning or the Emma, the earliest of which reached Liverpool on the 24th March. The 25th of March therefore is the earliest date from which our examination need commence.

2. From Mrs. Troubridge, mother of the young woman to whom Richard Brown was married during his stay in England, I learned that the young couple sailed for Sydney in the Maria Somes. Mrs. Brown was unable to give me the date of the vessel's departure, but a search through a file of the Times for April, 1856, shows that she left Gravesend on the 23d of that month. The period to be analysed is therefore confined to the interval between the 25th March and the 25th April, 1856.

3. During this period, as we learn from Mrs. Brown's statement, Richard Brown was at home every day except Saturdays and Sundays. These were respectively, 29th and 30th of March, and 5th, 6th, 12th, 13th, 19th, and 20th of April.

4. Dr. Marsden, in his evidence, states most distinctly that he did not see Madame R. until at least "one clear day" had elapsed after her attack. Dr. Marsden's visits take place on the Monday and Friday of each week. Mme. R.'s seizure, therefore, did not occur on a Sunday. This reduces the days on which it may have happened to the 29th March and 5th, 12th, and 19th April.

5. From Mrs. Troubridge's evidence we learn that Mrs. Brown and the whole party slept at Gravesend on the Saturday night previous to the sailing of the Maria Somes. Mrs. Brown was therefore absent from town on the 19th April. The issue is thus narrowed to the 29th March and the 5th and 12th April.

6. From Mrs. Brown's statement we learn that on the Saturday and Sunday preceding the wedding her son's friend Aldridge slept at the house. The wedding took place on the 14th April. On the 12th April, therefore, Mrs. Brown was not alone. The only days, therefore, on which the occurrence, as described, could have taken place are the 29th March and 5th April.

At this point I feared for some time that my clue was at an end. This would, however, have been most unsatisfactory, as the possible error of a week in point of date would have seriously detracted from the trustworthiness of the entire case. The only possible chance of determining the point seemed to lie in ascertaining the precise date of the servant's dismissal, and it at length occurred to me that this might be accomplished by means of the police records of the court before which she was carried. From them I found—

7. That the offence for which she was discharged was committed on Sunday, the 30th of April. On the 29th, therefore, she was still in Mrs. Brown's house. The only day, therefore, on which Mme. R.'s first seizure could have taken place, as stated during Richard Brown's stay in England, and on a night when Mrs. Brown was alone in the house, was the 5th of April.

The importance of this date, thus fixed, you will, I think, at once perceive.

Hugh Miller's First Interview with Burns.—He wore a broad Lowland bonnet, and his plain homely suit of coarse russet seemed to bespeak him a peasant of, perhaps, the poorest class; but as he emerged from the gloom, and the red light fell full on his countenance, I saw an indescribable something in the expression that in an instant awakened my curiosity. He was rather above the middle size, of a frame the most muscular and compact I have almost ever seen, and there was a blended mixture of elasticity and firmness in his tread, that, to one accustomed, as I have been, to estimate the physical capabilities of men, gave evidence of a union of immense personal strength, with great activity. My first idea regarding the stranger, and I know not how it should have struck me, was that of a very powerful frame, animated by a double portion of vitality. The red light shone full on his face and gave a ruddy tinge to the complexion which I afterwards found it wanted, for he was naturally of a darker hue than common; but there was no mistaking the expression of the large flashing eyes, the features that seemed so thoroughly cast in the mould of thoughts, and the broad, full, perpendicular forehead. —Hugh Miller's Tales and Sketches.

In Spain, Italy, France and Germany, it is hard to say that much belief of formal Christianity remains among the more educated part of the community, or to guess how deep and gross and fearful unbelief has penetrated among the lowest populations of the towns. It is indeed allowed, nature not opposing, that each should rather acquire for himself than for another whatever pertains to the enjoyment of life; but nature does not allow this, that by the spoliation of others we should increase our own means, resources and opulence. It is evident that there is a manifest progress in the succession of beings on the surface of the earth. This progress consists in an increasing similarity to the living fauna, and among the vertebrates, especially in their increasing resemblance to man. But this connection is not the consequence of a direct lineage between the faunas of different ages. There is nothing like parental descent connecting them. The fishes of the Palæozoic age are in no respect the ancestors of the reptiles of the secondary age, nor does man descend from the mammals which preceded him in the tertiary age. The link by which they are connected is of a higher and immaterial nature, and their connection is to be sought in the Creator himself, whose aim in forming the earth, in allowing it to undergo the successive changes which geology has pointed out, and in creating successively all the different types of animals which have passed away, was to introduce man upon the surface of our globe. Man is the end towards which all the animal creation has tended from the first appearance of the Palæozoic fishes.—Agassiz—Principles of Zoology.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1864.

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE CURRENCY.

DURING the present week the Supreme Court of California has decided two important cases, each of which is of more interest to all members of the community than the decisions of that Court generally are. The first was a case involving the constitutionality of the law of Congress making treasury notes, or greenbacks, a legal tender in payment of debts, in the decision of which the Court has made a learned and logical exposition of the inherent powers of the Federal Government.

They show with much clearness of argument that the Government of the United States is clothed by the organic law with powers coextensive with its necessities, and that among these is the right to give the quality of money to its promises which are issued on the public faith. It is a vindication of the course of those loyal men who have held to the opinion that the best way to protect the Constitution is to preserve the life and vigor of the Government—who do not believe that the latter should be sacrificed in order that some obsolete rule of strict construction may be embalmed.

Nor does the Court appear to find the right of Congress to pass the Legal Tender Act in any single one of the powers specified in the Constitution, but rather to derive it from all the powers and obligations either expressed or implied. So far as the State Court is concerned, it is settled, therefore, that greenbacks are a legal tender for all debts created after the passage of the Act of Congress.

As to debts existing prior to the Act, the lawyers say that the rules of statutory construction always adopted by the Courts, do not permit the Act of Congress to have a retrospective operation, no such intention being expressed in the Act itself, and it being manifestly unjust that contracts made when gold alone was a legal tender, should be satisfied by any currency of less value. Besides, it is also a rule of the Courts that all laws in operation at the time become a part of any contract made between parties. If the laws which made gold the only legal tender entered into and became a part of contracts made prior to the Legal Tender Act of Congress, it follows that the promisee has not only a moral but also a legal right to the payment of his debt in gold. This question has never been passed upon by our Court; but Judge Ware, of the U. S. District Court in Maine, lately decided in accordance with the views we have expressed.

The second important case decided by our Supreme Court is in favor of the Specific Contract Law of our Legislature, by which all contracts payable in a particular kind of currency are enforceable according to their provisions. This is a great relief to the business community.

It affords a security for the investment of money at reasonable rates, and will be followed by unlocking millions of dollars which have lain idle in San Francisco. Capital is always timorous, and in monetary circles it has been a question whether the Contract Law would be enforced. That question now is happily at rest, and we cannot doubt the benefit to follow.

MURDER AS A MATHEMATICAL CERTAINTY.

IN this age of uncertainties, when everything goes, and what doesn't go fluctuates, it is pleasant to know that there is at least one event to which we can look forward with confident expectation. Amusements may flag; the Opera House may be compelled to close its doors; merchants may fail, and manufactures be suspended, but we may rest assured that Murder will go on as regularly as though the crimson wheels which regulate its recurrence moved by superior clockwork. We have a new moon every month, and a murder to every three moons. It is a rather novel way of dividing the seasons; but the climate of this country is a peculiar one, and without some such contrivance to mark the changes of the year, it would be almost impossible to rightly distinguish between spring and autumn. These murders are not the common affairs where one man kills another in a prosaic way, and is arrested and tried and hung in the regular course of law: they are crimes "terrible and mysterious," furnishing reporters with opportunities for that dilation and speculation in which they so much delight, and officers of justice with an excuse for arresting all the Chinamen in the community. And the most charming feature of all is that nobody is hung; the gallows beckons with its creaking arms in vain—no one steps forward to submit to its embrace. Women are murdered in byeways and highways under circumstances of horror which vie with the inventions of those pleasant romancists whose reign has marked a new era in literature; the deeds are done as coolly and deliberately as though there were an understanding between their perpetrators and those local guardians who patrol the city to see that no nuisances are committed and that no wretch with one arm and the fragment of a leg peddles without a license. The murderer washes his bloody hands, packs up his booty, perfumes his handkerchief from the essences which stand on the dressing-table, lights his cigar with a curl-paper which he takes from the dead woman's hair, and starts out for a morning walk. We meet him on the corner; sit opposite to him in a car; he travels around the city as though its freedom had been presented to him by the municipality in an ungrammatical speech, and all the while he examines the bolts and fastenings on our doors with an attentive eye, listens for the clank of coin in our pockets with a critical ear, and carefully calculates which one of all this city's population it will best pay to kill. By this time he has probably come to look upon this city as his shambles, and the population as his sheep. The police is not viewed by him in an unfriendly light; they have photographed eyes, and earned the praises of the local press for their vigilance, but to him they have done no harm at all. He still lives and walks, and has his matutinal roll and his post-prandial divertisement; and, taking all in all, it would be impossible for him to select a more favorable field for his operations. Probably he proposes to fight it out on this line if it takes several summers.

It is a very mistaken idea that murder will out, and the proverb to that effect applies better to the measles. It is not at all strange that the first murder on record was discovered promptly—for there was no police in those days. Again, the population of the world was somewhat more sparse then than it is now. An alibi would let Adam out naturally enough, and Eve was above suspicion. But in this day it is different. Families have multiplied; we are sorry to say that human intelligence has not increased in the same proportion. The needle murderer must be looked for in a human haystack. And the preliminaries for the search occupy no inconsiderable time. In the first place, it is necessary to snatch all the Chinamen in Christendom; and this is no easy task, for a multitude of them have strayed from within their own walls, and their plaintive tails appeal to us on every hand as plentifully as Miss Braddon's novels. Then every "suspicious person"—that is, every man with black hair and whiskers and moustache and wearing a slouched hat—it is a fact established by history that all murderers wear slouched hats, Cain should be painted with one—must be arrested at once. It is as plain as a pike-staff, that a murderer having committed a murder would start at once for Sacramento or San José, so all passengers by boat or by rail must be detained until they show receipted board-bills, marriage certificates, and other evidences of respectability. It is clear at a moment's glance that the man who plans a bold daring murder or robbery, executing the deed with the surety of fate and the swiftness of lightning, leaving not a trace behind him, much less his card for the curious who seek it in every corner with expectant eyes—it is plain, we say, that this man must be either a fool or a madman; it is patent enough at a glance that he would rush frantically through the principal streets with blood on his clothing and a bundle in his arms and go precisely where the policemen, acting on the supposition that he is a fool, would first go to look for him. It is not easy to contemplate the possibility of the murderer in all these instances having laid his plans beforehand, and darting from the door where the crime has been done into another which is ajar to receive him. No blood appears on the door which gives him refuge, no placards saying to the multitude, "For the murderer, enquire within," are seen upon its walls—the house presents as innocent and quiet an appearance as its fellows, and under its shelter the murderer makes himself presentable, and by and by walks out and mingles with the crowd, no longer distinguishable, and as nonchalant as his neighbors. Of course, the man who plotted a murder or a robbery coolly and executed it deliberately would not have sufficient brains to avoid doing just what the police might suppose he would do and refrain from going where they would most probably look for him.

As before remarked, murder in this city seems to be reduced down to a mathematical certainty. Not only can one predict the time of the recurrence of the crime, but it is also possible to tell how it will be committed—battering in the skull is the style. Whose turn will it be next to be found—here we borrow a phrase from the reportorial note-book—"weltering in his gore"? It is not very comfortable to lie down to sleep or sit down to a late supper with the consciousness that a professor of the somewhat occult science of murder—a graduate in it with several diplomas accorded him by this city—is looking stealthily in at the window, seeing how you are off for plate and jewelry, and silently planning a job for the undertaker's benefit in which you are to figure conspicuously. The thing is becoming monotonous. It would be a pleasing variety to have an execution, and see the thing done in a legal way. Under a Napoleonic administration, three times and out would probably be the rule adopted so far as these mysterious murders are concerned. If the murderer were not brought to the guillotine a few gendarmes would very likely be. We make no suggestion, but certainly something ought to be done.

THE Paris Committee on Book-Hawking have refused their stamp (without which no book peddler can sell any work) to M. Edmond About's last work, Le Progres. He has appealed to the Emperor to reverse their decision. They refused their stamp to his novel, Madelon; he persuaded the Emperor to annul their veto.

NOTHINGS.

I HAVE been reading Mme. d'Hericourt's book about woman. It has set my brain agoing on a favorite subject, and I shall let out some of my ideas. Women come within the general sphere which I had prescribed for myself. They are nothings. They are nothing in law, nothing in science, nothing in philosophy, nothing in business—mere imitators in morals and echoes in religion. They may be something in love, but I am a bachelor, and am not supposed to know anything about that.

THE BOY THAT WAS AFRAID TO BE BORN AGAIN.

Once upon a time, a little boy was found weeping bitterly, after having been at church. They asked him what was the matter. He replied that the preacher said he must be born again, and he was afraid he would be a girl the next time.

That little fellow appreciated the position. I sympathize with him. If I were in danger of being born again, with any probability of being a girl the next time, it would make me very unhappy.

But I shall not be born again.

HUMAN NATURE NOT CORRUPT.

Human nature is not naturally corrupt. I abhor the Calvinistic theory of utter depravity and hopeless perdition. It is not the men who are depraved; it is the temptation which makes them bad. Educate all alike, not only well but highly; train them up in good company; dress them neatly and comfortably; give them enough to eat; enable them to support themselves honorably by their labor; pay them fairly, and nine-tenths of the crime would be at an end. Society causes the crime, and the individual suffers the punishment. That's my theory.

I AM SATISFIED WITH MYSELF.

But whether men generally be corrupt or not, I am conscious of no need of regeneration. Fortune has made me neither rich nor poor, and has placed me in circumstances where it is my interest to be honest. Adversity has taught me to be humble in my expectations of life. Nature has given me moderate tastes, self-reliance to choose my own course in life, and courage to do as I think a man ought to do. Education has ennobled me by bringing down from the heaven of literature the most glorious spirits of the past and making them my daily companions, my most intimate friends—the solace of my loneliness, the inspirers of my joys, the patterns of my morality. I shall not be born again.

I am in no danger of being a girl the next time. But let us make an impossible supposition: If I were born again, and were a girl the next time, what would be the result?

I would be a "nothing."

A GIRL'S FATE.

I should as a child be kept in the house, instead of having "the freedom of the city" with the boys. I should not be permitted to play soldier, to climb fences, or to go in swimming. I should be a spiritless booby or a tom-boy. I should have to go out with mother making stupid calls, and spend all my years in a state of suppressed animation. Every outbreak of physical activity or mental vivacity would be repressed as a dangerous symptom. When I wished to have any innocent amusement I should be checked and told to act like a "little lady." Natural disposition would become vicious, and affectation and hypocrisy the accompaniments of virtue.

THE CAREER OF A YOUNG LADY.

But I should cease to be a child: I should become a young lady. I should be taught to embroider garments that would never be seen, to paint pictures of impossible flowers and landscapes, to play the piano and sing just well enough to be a terror to all people of cultivated taste, and to speak enough French to understand a simple quotation; but I should remain ignorant of all the natural sciences, of all the mechanical arts, of all the learned professions, of all the philosophy of the past and enterprise of the present. I should feel the impulses of the tender passion, but I must check them all.

> Man's love is of man's life a thing apart,
> 'Tis woman's whole existence; man may range
> The court, camp, church, the vessel, and the mart;
> Sword, gown, gain, glory, offer in exchange
> Pride, fame, ambition, to fill up his heart—
> And few there are whom these cannot estrange.
> Men have all these resources—we but one:
> To love again, and be again undone!

THE DANGERS OF LOVE.

Though love must be the only sphere of existence, the only road to fortune, the only source of happiness, without which life to a woman is a failure, I must act as if I never felt the passion. Though all women fall in love with particular individuals—though I, like others, must feel a strong affection for this or that one among my acquaintances—I must never show that preference. I dare look no strange man in the face; I dare not express any admiration for any male friend; I must go through the streets with downcast eyes, and through the world with a smothered heart.

The holiest passion of my nature would become a demon constantly tempting me to throw myself down from the eminence of respectability into the bottomless pit of social infamy. Human nature is weak, temptation is ripe, and I might err. I should then find that I had shattered the whole sphere of my life, ruined myself forever, disgraced my friends, and indeed committed the inexcusable sin, which continues not only through life, but follows the memory after death, and attaches its stigma to the children of the third and fourth generation.

I might escape temptation, and follow the beaten path. In either event I should find that there are two codes of morality; that society overlooks in man the offence which he treats as the greatest of crimes in woman. Each sex has its own kind of honesty. Man's honesty is not expected in woman, and woman's honesty is not expected in man.

CATCHING A HUSBAND.

I must choose a husband while a girl, while ignorant and without experience, in a world where experience is needed so much. I shall be told that husband-catching is my business, and I must take the first one I can get. I must not think of obtaining the man I love. It is enough if I am indifferent to him. Love will come afterwards. Or even if it should not come, I must marry any way. And then I should be told how Jane Smith would not accept a good offer, and now she is an old maid, and the man who wanted to marry her is a millionaire. And I should be told of Polly Jones, who rejected an old man established in business, to marry a young fellow whom she loved, and now she lives in an alley and has half-a-dozen children.

THE RIGHT OF A WIFE.

I might succeed in life. I might catch a husband. The woman's heaven upon earth of matrimony and maternity might come down to me. But waking up after the orange-flowers had withered and the honeymoon had passed, what would I find? I have made myself the slave of my husband. He can take me whither he wishes, determine what company I shall keep, fix upon the style in which I shall live, and the manner in which I shall spend my time. He resides in the city or in the country, in a palace or in a hovel; he fills his house with company or closes it against all his acquaintances. He gives me fine dresses and a splendid table or not as it pleases him. He determines whether my children shall be bred as Catholics, Protestants, Mohammedans or Mormons. Everything is at his discretion. He alone carries the purse; and even when property is set apart for the wife under the control of a trustee, by the advantages of his position, he can compel her to surrender the money to him as she receives it. "The husband and wife are one before the law and the husband is that one."

My husband may be generous, kind and good. He may make me happy. But as I must choose him in ignorance, this will be but my good luck if it is so. The proportion of good men is very small, and the chances are decidedly against me. I learn from those who have had good opportunities of observing that twenty-five per cent. of the married couples hate each other bitterly and would separate without delay if the law allowed it. Another twenty-five per cent. have occasional serious quarrels, and at such times would willingly separate. Another twenty-five per cent. are indifferent to each other and live together because of their marriage, not because of their love. In fifteen per cent. there is a devoted love on one side, and indifference or dislike on the other; and finally the remaining ten per cent. heartily love each other and never quarrel.

LOVE IN MATRIMONY.

My chance, therefore, to be happy is about one in ten. To a person of my enthusiasm and earnestness of character, marriage without love is desecration. It is impossible to ascertain whether matrimony begins with love and appreciation. There are many other motives. The woman may marry for a home; the man may marry for money, for the assistance of his matrimonial relatives in business, for political influence, or for the sake of having a stylish household. And even when love exists at first, it may not continue long. The wife, who has injured her constitution by drinking vinegar, eating confectionery, tight-lacing, idleness and avoidance of the sun, loses her beauty after she has borne a few children, and becomes an old woman prematurely, weak in body and querulous in disposition. Spending her life in the drudgery of the kitchen and the nursery, her temper soured and her time monopolized by half-a-dozen little ones, she has no time for mental improvement. Her husband, who was only her equal at marriage—perhaps her inferior—is constantly learning more and more, and soon he finds that he has outgrown her. He takes an interest in matters beyond her scope. Her conversation, her society, has lost its charm. He longs for those who are upon the same level of intellectual development with himself. He continues to gain in physical and mental vigor for fifteen years after his wife has entered upon the downward road of life. He may be faithful, he may be kind, he may be attentive, he may make her happy; but it is only a "may be."

And then there is the possibility of widowhood. Left, after the beauty of health and youth have passed, with three or four children, without money and without friends. How unfortunate! "The widow and the orphan" have long been two of the types of misery.

Or perhaps I should not marry. And then I must be stigmatized through life as an "old maid." Nature itself would become my enemy and reduce me to the typical scragginess of the class. No one to wait upon me, no one to marry me, no one to stand between me and the storms of fortune. Or, if I should have any friend generous enough to assist me, I must almost unavoidably be a constant burthen.

WOMAN'S CLOTHING.

As a woman, I must wear the clothing dictated by fashion. In cut it is neither elegant nor convenient. It drags the dust of summer and the mud of winter. It is fit neither for play nor for work. The shoes are too thin for walking out in the rain; the skirts afford no protection against the cold. While men shiver in the heaviest leather boots and woollen socks, women wear light cotton stockings and thin cloth shoes. The material is flimsy, the colors bright, the trimmings endless. Everything utilitarian is unfashionable. A rich lady needs to have at least one woman sewing for her continually. Ribbons, laces, embroideries, artificial flowers, jewelry—all these are part of her attire. Who can give a list of the articles necessary to a woman's dress? How many separate pieces go to rig her out complete? She must try to show her rank in her dress. More than half a century has elapsed since gandy colors and laces and kickshaws have been abandoned as parts of man's dress; but the woman still keeps them. Her clothing may cost thousands upon thousands of dollars, and the greater the cost the greater the pride of the wearer.

Eugenie has a carriage to take her through the street; she never steps upon a pavement or a floor where a particle of mud or dust is seen. She has millions of pin-money annually, and she can afford to drag after her a long trail of silk and lace. But why should every washerwoman from Yreka to San Diego follow her example by having the trail, but depart from her example by dragging it through the filth?

It is not alone that woman's dress is absurd in its general character, but the style is frequently changed without any reason. Eugenie is the great dictator, and her nod commands more prompt and more extensive obedience than the sceptres of all the kings and the keys of all the popes. Woe be to the woman who did not put on hoops when Eugenie had need of them! Woe be to the woman who did not put on a clam-shell bonnet when Eugenie wanted to show her face. And so on.

Consider the disadvantages of long hair as compared with short. Wealthy women spend on an average an hour a day in combing and dressing their hair. Its length, the difficulty of keeping it clean, and the necessity of having it smooth, with every fibre in its place, consume a large part of the time of a woman. A man, on the other hand, combs his hair in two minutes, and with that cleans it better than a woman does hers with an hour's work.

All the purposes for which dress should be worn are considered in man's clothing, and a near approach has been made to the best pattern for protection against the sun and the cold, for decency, elegance, economy, healthfulness, simplicity, cleanliness, avoidance of show, durability and convenience for labor: but in all these respects woman's clothing is far inferior.

WOMAN'S WORK.

If a woman wants to work, what can she do? Among her chief occupations are chamber-work, washing and nursing—all of them disagreeable and ill-paid. She may be a sempstress, a milliner or a book-folder. A dozen occupations stand open to her, but in all the labor is exhausting and the pay slight; the woman is an employé and not an employer, and, as a rule, the female receives less than half the wages of the male laborer. She needs as much to support her; her clothing costs as much; her food costs as much; her fare while travelling, her place at any amusement, costs as much. She needs money as much as the man, but she shall not have it. She is a woman, and not only are her wages but half those of the men, but she is entirely excluded from all the more profitable occupations. She cannot be a lawyer, a physician, an office-holder, an importer, a wholesale merchant, a broker, a manufacturer, or a master mechanic; and yet she is fitted by nature to succeed in all these branches if she could but get the education. She has not now the knowledge or the judgment, merely because she is excluded from the education and experience by which the necessary knowledge and judgment are acquired.

Is not this a pretty serious display of disadvantages? And a very incomplete one too, as must be apparent to any one after a moment's consideration. I cut the list of woman's evils short here, for fear that the gentle sex, when they discover how unhappy they ought to be, will become unhappy in fact.

I might counterbalance the account by a statement of their advantages. Their protection from heat and cold, their exclusion from the battle-field and the grain-field, the constant attention of the other sex, the exemption of many of them from the pecuniary anxieties which beset their husbands, their existence spent in the midst of affection, while the man lives in strife. All these must not be forgotten.

But a better time is coming. I see it. The time is full of signs. Free work is the motto of the commencement of the new era. "A fair day's wages for a fair day's work," is the honestest demand ever made in this world, and it must be granted.

ROBINSON'S GYMNASTICS.

The other evening, having been authorized by a special invitation, I went to see the Gymnastic Class of Mr. C. J. Robinson at Miss Aldrich's school. There were about forty couples dressed in uniform. The women all wore Bloomers; the men colored woollen overshirts. I like to see the Bloomer costume. It is the dress of the women of the future. It has all the elements of success in it. So long as Eugenie is Autocrat of the Fashion-plates, so long as women's clothing is devised not for the health, comfort and welfare of the wearers, but for the profit of the silk, ribbon and lace manufacturers of France, so long the Bloomer must wait in disgrace, but no longer. The dresses are graceful and handsome to my eye, and they appear to great advantage in the exercises, which are a sort of Platonic dancing.

DANCING.

Next to gymnasties, I like the dance. It is the most exhilarating mode of taking exercise. Let Gail Hamilton rail if she will. What business had she to go to a ball in the day time and look at things critically? People will waltz in spite of her and in spite of the churches. She and they, instead of wasting their efforts in vain attempts to stop waltzing, should try to keep it within the proper limits. Grand balls should not be encouraged. They are objectionable because they must be made up of people strangers to one another; because the women are required by etiquette to have expensive dresses; because the dancing commences very late, runs all night and exhausts the participators so that they need several days of rest to recover; and because the supper, which it is necessary to eat, is always unwholesome on account of the late hour at which it is eaten. To him who understands dancing and likes it, I say, join some dancing club; to him who does not I recommend the instruction of my friend, Mr. Eddy. San Francisco is a paradise of dancers. Its perpetually cool climate always renders exercise agreeable, and the activity of our population can find no more innocent or delightful entertainment. KEINMANN.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

THE severe illness of Miss Richings last week—the result of her unremitting labors—kept the doors of the Academy closed from Friday to Monday. Martha was played to a crowded house on Wednesday evening. Miss Richings as "Lady Harriet," achieved a marked triumph, surpassing her usual excellence of vocalization and acting. Her singing of "The Last Rose of Summer" was well worthy the applause that followed and the encore that was so vigorously demanded. Not only was it tenderly and artistically sung, but also much more unostentatiously and naturally than other famous singers are in the habit of rendering it. The audience were delighted, and manifested that delight in a manner so unmistakable that well-founded fears were entertained on some sides that they would permit nothing else to be sung that night. Mr. Seguin's acting was very good indeed. The remaining characters did not appear to very good advantage. The tenor airs in this delicious opera are the chef-d'ouvres of the composer, and Mr. Hill ("Lionel") did not do them justice. Miss Kempton ("Nancy") seemed to be suffering from a cold, and did not make of the acting opportunities of her role as much as she might, and probably will, when she has had a riper experience on the stage. The comic element, which should enter into all amusements to popularize them, was well presented in Mr. Gregg's attempt to dance, though his steps possibly did not much contribute to the pleasure of his partners. He had so little to do in the piece that there was no need for his contriving to do it badly. The "Spinning Quartette" was quite lively. This evening Miss Richings has a benefit, the opera of the occasion being The Daughter of the Regiment. We bespeak for the beneficiary one of those houses which San Francisco was wont to give deserving artistes in those palmy days when gold was viewed as a circulating medium merely, and not looked at in the light of something to be planted and nursed. That the house will be a full one, however, we can scarcely doubt, for this City of the Bay is seldom known to be wanting in gallantry.

Maguire's Opera House has been busy with The Victims, a Tom Taylor play, and one of that author's best. The pleasures of married life and the miseries of a single existence are so admirably illustrated, so faithfully set forth, that ambitious young ladies and marrying mamas could not do better than present the manager with a service of plate for the service he has done them in bringing the play out. Mr. Wheatleigh as "Joshua Butterby" worked out a capital piece of acting. Mr. Mayo did the martyred "Mr. Merryweather" as well as though he had had the benefit of domestic rehearsals of the part for years; Mr. Thorne was scarcely sentimental and spoony enough for a poet patronized by as plump and pretty a matron saint as "Mrs. Merryweather," (Mrs. Perry;) but still he carried the part well. Mr. Thorne's forte is the villain, and poetry is a mild form of crime and one which seldom begets remorse in the mind of the perpetrator. The Scotch play of Jeanie Deans was brought out to a fair house last evening. The continued absence of Mrs. Edwin from the stage of this theatre, owing to a protracted season of illness, affords room for much regret to that lady's many and warm admirers. This afternoon a grand matinée will be given, for particulars of which and the evening performance, the advertisements on another page may be consulted.

Paul Julien drew a crowded house to his farewell concert on Wednesday afternoon, If Nero fiddled as well as Julien does, we can almost pardon him for fiddling while Rome burned, and would find an excuse for the Romans in gathering round to hear him play, instead of running with the machines and manning the brakes to put the fire out. "Lubin," in his New York letter last week, asserts that Nero didn't fiddle at the fire, and that there were no fiddles known in the first century; but as "Lubin" was not at the fire, it is not supposable that he knows much about it. One thing is certain. Julien had a full house on Wednesday, and the concert went off charmingly, the Bianchis singing as well as though they had been lubricating their throats, during the period of their retirement, with all manner of vocal essences.

THE TWO VILLAGES.

OVER the river, on the hill,
Lieth a village white and still;
All aronnd it the forest trees
Shiver and whisper in the breeze;
Over it sailing shadows go
Of soaring hawk and screaming crow;
And mountain grasses, low and sweet,
Grow in the middle of every street.

Over the river, under the hill,
Another village lieth still:
There I see in the cloudy night
Twinkling stars of household light—
Fires that gleam at the smithy's door,
Mists that curl on the river shore;
And in the roads no grasses grow,
For the wheels that hasten to and fro.

In that village on the hill,
Never is sound of smithy or mill;
The houses are thatched with grasses and flowers,
Never a clock to toll the hours;
The marble doors are always shut—
You cannot enter in hall or hut;
All the villagers lie asleep,
Never a grain to sow or reap;
Never in dreams to moan or sigh,
Silent and idle and low they lie.

In that village under the hill,
When the night is starry and still,
Many a weary soul in prayer
Looks to the other village there,
And, weeping and sighing, longs to go
Up to that Home from this below;
Longs to sleep by the forest wild
Whither have vanished wife and child,
And heareth, praying, this answer fall:
"Patience! that village will hold ye all."

TERRIFIC COMBAT BETWEEN A GORILLA AND A LION.

(From a forthcoming work entitled "Adventures in Many Lands"—not by De Chaillu.)

MY black guide, whose movements were as noiseless and gliding as those of a snake, was about two yards in front of me, pushing gently but swiftly on hands and knees through the tangled underwood and thorny creepers, which made the entrance into the dense and gloomy recesses of the primeval African forest almost impassable to the hardiest of the human race, and I was eagerly following in the track which he had made, when suddenly he paused, uttered a low slight hiss, and, placing his right hand behind him, made with it a gentle movement, warning me to be silent and cautious.

How long we both remained motionless and hardly daring to draw a breath I know not. It may have been five minutes. It appeared to me as many hours. I felt neither fear nor apprehension of danger, but my anxiety to obtain a sight of a living gorilla, and, if possible, to get within shot of him, and the hope that my black hunter had at length marked one, caused my heart to throb with expectation so loudly, that in order to still it I was obliged to hold my breath forcibly until the sense of suffocation became unbearable, and it was with great difficulty I repressed a spasmodic tendency to relieve the oppressed lungs by a scream. At length my guide moved forwards, but so silently that his progress was more like that of a shadow than of anything having life and weight in it. His hand was still carried behind him, the open palm towards me, and every motion of the fingers instinct with intelligence and warnings of the presence of danger the most imminent and deadly. The Fan (my guide was a splendid specimen of that noblest of the Central African tribes) again stopped. His palm expanded, and I instantly paused. The ground shook with a slight tremor. The air vibrated around us and beat flutteringly upon our ears, as the reader may have felt when the deepest bass of a great organ is gently touched. At first I did not perceive that the agitation was the result of sound; but as the vibration was passing away I distinguished a low deep roar, and found that some terrible beast—most probably either a lion or a gorilla—was close at hand, and was either conversing in a low tone with his mate, or was uttering the first notes of suspicion or alarm.

I had seen the nasty little birds which attend the rhinoceros and perform for the deep folds of his thick but not insensible hide the duty which in civilized society is remitted to the small-tooth comb. I knew how sharp a watch and ward they keep over the safety of their living feeding ground, and how they scream and dig their sharp and searching beaks into the fierce brute's ear when anything dangerous or strange approaches his resting place; and I feared lest some such courtierly parasite of the woods might have attached itself to the service and the court of the anthropoidal apish monarch, and was now whispering into his majesty's ear its suspicions that certain barbarian invaders, or low and villainous revolutionists of an inferior order of the gorilla species, were trespassing within the bounds which his majesty had been graciously pleased to reserve as the limits of his own exclusive private domain. I listened, but no particular note or chirp struck my ear. The silence was almost appalling; so was the darkness of that portion of the dense forest into which we had penetrated. Very shortly after we had entered the woods the fierce glare of the sun had ceased to penetrate to the ground except at rare intervals. The broad luxuriant upper foliage of the mighty trees completely excluded the blaze of the tropical sun, which shone down through a yellow atmosphere like the mouth of an open furnace, from a sphere of polished, glaring, reddened brass. At first there were cool extensive forest glades, and vast avenues of gigantic trees, populous and noisy with birds of gorgeous plumage but discordant voices; then came closer stems and lesser growth of scions springing emulously up amidst the giant parents of the woods. Thick tangles of tough-stalked creepers intertwining with thorny plants, like briars of gigantic growth, next barred our path in places which were thereby made absolutely impenetrable. At length, after threading our way through tracks which the wild animals had slightly made, we reached those darkest, densest portions of the woods where the Fan hunter knew that the gorilla could be only found, if found at all.

Here, in the interpenetralia, the voices of the forest had altogether ceased. The hiss of a serpent, the twitter of a grasshopper or locust, the hoot of an owl, or the chatter of a stray monkey might indeed be occasionally heard, but such sounds were few and far between, and they served rather to illustrate and mark the silence by showing how exceptional and discordant with all things around they were. The darkness, although nearly as deep as that of a starless night, was not nightlike. It was not thick and close and pitchy, provocative of closed eyes and slumber; it was a greenish black, living, startling, intelligent and wakeful, as though the light were struggling to break through from the outside, and exciting hope that it would succeed momentarily. The eyes strained to pierce the verdant gloom. They seemed to feel a power within them to become accustomed to it, and to dilate their pupils sufficiently to magnify the few attenuated rays which had floated into and lost themselves in that leafy-roofed dungeon until they should be made to illuminate its depths and unfold its secrets.

The pause which my guide now made was longer than the first one, but to me it was not so painful. The oppression was necessarily great, but my nerves were strung more perfectly to endure it, and my expectation was higher, more assured, and calm.

The Fan looked around to see where I was. The movement gave me pleasure, because I was then certain that my progress was so completely noiseless that even the quick ear of my savage friend had failed to detect the crushing of a withered stick or leaf beneath me. As the black turned his face to me his eyes were the only features that were distinctly visible. They appeared to be lighted up by a lurid fire within them, and when his head was sufficiently brought round to look upon me fully, his eyes glared brightly and fiercely as those of a royal Bengal tiger. Mine must have looked similarly upon him, for he made a gesture of surprise with hand and countenance, then grinned, showing his brilliant white teeth from ear to ear, and formed an O with his mouth, which I interpreted as an intimation that a gorilla, if not a whole family of those delicate monsters was within view; and bringing forward his rifle so as to see that the cap was right, he resumed his cautious advance. Turning a little to the left he made room for me to draw up alongside of him, and I then discovered that we had reached the inner edge of the brushwood, and that a clear space, forming a small amphitheatre in the forest, was before us. An enormous tree which seemed to have overshadowed and destroyed every plant and shrub within its range, occupied the centre, and formed the dense canopy of this open. A slight gesture from the black hunter directed my attention to the foot of the giant of the woods, but he at the same time placed one hand above his eyes, thereby intimating to me that I must shade mine before looking, lest the glare of them in the darkness should attract the attention of our game. Laying myself along my double-barrelled rifle, I shaded my eyes with both my hands and looked towards the great tree. Sitting on the ground, cross-legged, with his back against the trunk, his hands lying carelessly at his sides, with the palms turned up, and his head sunk down between his shoulders in a dozing, if not sleeping state, was a huge male gorilla. His profile was towards us. At the opposite side of the amphitheatre, the tree sometimes concealing them from our view, were a female and a young male feeding, and gathering some kind of nuts which the female occasionally carried and threw on the ground close to her dozing lord and master. I watched their proceedings for some time with intense interest. At length the Fan made a sign of interrogation, which recalled me to a sense of our position. We were too far from our dangerous game to risk a shot at him, which, if it only wounded without killing, would bring not only himself but possibly his wife and young hopeful upon us before we could draw another trigger. If we startled him only, without hitting him, he might plunge into the jungle and escape. We could not lie there all day looking at him without doing anything, and we dare not attempt to hold council with one another, as the lowest whisper would reach either the sleeping or the waking members of the family.

A few moments of irresolution terminated in my laying my rifle and taking a long and steady aim at the side of paterfamilias. It was difficult to cover my object, for a flickering exhalation was rising from the entire surface of the earth, through which the gorilla seemed to be in perpetual motion, in and out of the sight of my rifle, up and down, flashing and waving, rising and falling, until all confidence was lost in my power of taking aim so near the ground, and, being a crack shot under ordinary circumstances, I had just resolved to risk everything by standing up and taking an open shot at him from the shoulder, when a turn was given to my thoughts by the sudden appearance of a new sportsman in the form of a black python, some thirty feet in length, which was coiled round a small tree close to me, but which my rapt attention to my game had prevented me from observing previously. The python had unwound a few coils, and having thus freed about ten or twelve feet of his body to enable him to examine me and my proceedings more closely, he was hanging within a yard of my face, his long, black, forked tongue darting from his mouth, waving and retiring again with the rapidity of lightning, and his glittering eyes glancing from me to the rifle as though he wondered what sort of an animal it was, and whether it might prove to be a more dainty morsel than I myself might be. I had a Persian scimitar as keen as a razor in my hunting belt. The snake in his wavings to and fro brought his neck within a foot of my shoulder. I slid my right hand down to feel for the handle of my sword, keeping my eyes fixed upon the python. I grasped and was drawing the weapon, wondering whether the snake or I would strike first, when both of us were startled by a terrific shriek, or rather a series of shrieks, as if a strong rough woman were rending the air in mingled rage and pain.

The python vanished as my sword flew out.

The shrieks were uttered by the female gorilla, who had gone some distance into the wood whilst I was engaged, first with trying to aim at the male, and afterwards with watching the terrible reptile. She had either disturbed a lion who was sleeping away the effects of a hearty supper, or had met him on his way to the cool depths of the forest, and had nearly afforded him a morning repast. She sprang into the nearest tree, uttering at the same time those startling human cries which had frightened away the python and nearly unnerved me. As to my guide, he had not seen my danger, and he was still watching the male gorilla, patiently awaiting my decision and expecting every instant the report of my rifle. The shrieks had startled him a little, not so much, however, as they had affected me; for he had heard the like before, and he knew they would be uttered the moment that either a shot should be fired or the female should discover us by any chance. But when a roar, that shook the ground on which we lay, announced the nature of the danger from which the female gorilla had so narrowly escaped, my Fan friend, black as he was, actually became pallid with fear!

The roar of the lion was instantly answered by a deeper, hoarser, louder, and more savage roar. A sound so expressive of anger, defiance, and relentless, savage, cruel ferocity, I never heard!

I looked at the Fan, and smiled. He understood me instantly. His limbs ceased to tremble. He closed his mouth with an effort, grinned and placed his fingers on his lips, and turned to watch the combat which was now inevitable, and in the occurrence of which lay our best hopes of safety.

Scarcely thirty yards on our left, the lion had come crashing through the jungle, and had cleared the close inner tangle with a bound. He now stood full in sight in the clear open, his head erect, his mane standing up and out, all straight, like the hair of an angry cat, magnifying his apparent bulk to colossal proportions; his tail, which at first stood nearly straight, was waving from side to side. At length it struck his ribs alternately on either side with sounding blows, and he uttered a longer and more terrific roar than that which he had given when the female gorilla escaped from him. Opposite to him was the male gorilla, now looking most unlike the uncouth figure which we had seen propped against the tree.

At the first shriek from his mate, the gorilla had sprung into life and sudden energy. Placing the knuckles of his upper hands upon the ground, he bounded lightly into the air to a surprising height, rising from all four hands together, and coming down upon all fours again. When the lion roared, the gorilla seemed at once to comprehend the nature both of the challenge and the adversary, and to resolve upon fighting, although it would have been easy for him to escape by springing into a tree. He rose upon his hinder hands (or feet), and standing erect, looking very like a large-bodied, long-armed, short-legged, powerful negro, about six feet two inches in height, he uttered his tremendous acceptance of the lion's challenge, beating his breast at the same time with his huge fists alternately, and producing sounds like heavy blows upon a bass drum. When the lion sprang into the inclosure and stood bristling before him, the gorilla dropped upon all-fours again, with his knuckles on the ground; his eyes, which flamed like fire seen through rubies, fixed upon his dreadful enemy, and his eyebrows working up and down with inconceivable rapidity, giving to his countenance a look of such demoniac ferocity, that it made the lion pause at least, if he did not quail.

Lashing his sides with his tail until he roused himself to fury, the lion delivered his second roar, as though his honor were concerned in outroaring no less than in vanquishing by his prowess all antagonists; and, on his part, the gorilla, albeit questions of honor seemed little likely to be favored or considered by him, accepted nevertheless the preliminary contest of angry noise, and uttered another roar so utterly demoniac and horrible, standing up again in order to deliver it freely, that the lion crouched at once to spring upon him and bring the question of superior prowess to the proof. A few short, swift steps—a bound of twenty feet—two or three sharp, snarling growls—and I expected to see the combatants locked in a fata, embrace! But it was not so.

As the lion rose in his long bound, the gorilla sprang also, but more lightly and higher, straight up into the air. The lion struck upwards to catch him; the action turned himself over, and he fell heavily on his side, the gorilla dropping on him, striking him twice, and then springing off with a sidling, jumping run, to a distance of several yards. Instantaneous as had been the encounter, both were severely wounded. The gorilla was bleeding from the head and back. The lion had a fearful gash across his ribs; and, judging from the crashing sounds of the two blows which he had received, I thought that some of his ribs must have been broken. The lion rushed without a moment's pause at his adversary, but the agility of the gorilla was too great to permit the lion to close at his pleasure. For some minutes the movements of the lion in attack, and of the gorilla in avoidance, were almost too rapid for the eye to follow their evolutions. At length the lion paused, bewildered by the speed and activity of his antagonist. Instantly the gorilla sprang upon and rolled him over with a single blow upon the side of the head. Again the chase and avoidance were resumed, but this time for a much longer space than before, the lion being resolved to catch the nimble ape; but again he was obliged to pause, and again he was instantly knocked over. When he rose he staggered, whether from the effects of the terrific blows which he had received, or from giddiness resulting from his gyrations in pursuit of the gorilla, it was impossible to decide, but he reeled and fell off several steps to the right before he recovered sufficiently to prepare for another charge. In the meantime the gorilla was dodging round and bobbing up and down before him, as captured monkeys may be often seen to do in their cages when persons are teasing them. Both lion and gorilla kept up an incessant noise, growling, snarling, roaring, and screaming, varying their tones in accordance with their actions or sufferings, and although nothing like a close had taken place, both were bleeding freely; the lion's right eye was either shut up or gone, and the gorilla was nearly scalped. The lion had now learned so much of his enemy's strength and activity that he tried several feints to get him within range. He lay down, but the gorilla kept jumping round him so near that he was obliged to spring round with equal alertness, to avoid being taken by surprise. He tried another rush, but he stopped sooner than at first, and when the gorilla sprang upon him to strike, the lion turned on his back and received him with teeth and claws.

The crisis of the battle had arrived. Growls, snarls, shrieks and roars came out in a demoniac chorus from a confused mass of swirling leaves and dust; limbs, teeth, claws, blood, and springing bodies, as though ten beasts instead of two were combating amidst a whirlwind! I became so excited that I could scarcely command myself. A crash, as of smashing large bones, and a horrible shriek! The noise and fury of the combat were redoubled for a minute or two! Then came a pause. The dust and cloud of leaves subsided. The lion was uppermost. The left arm of the gorilla was across his tremendous mouth. It was the crunching of the double bones of the fore-arm which I had heard! His claws were firmly fixed in the gorilla's shoulder and head, but he was himself nearly torn asunder and disemboweled! Huge rents were in his body, and the feet of the gorilla were buried in his loins, whilst the mighty right arm of the ape was free, and would be active again directly breath had been taken.

The final struggle quickly came. Up roso the cloud of dust and leaves again! Whirling, shrieking, bounding, striking, growling, struggling, groaning, the confused mass rushed hither and tbither with increased velocity! Over and over it rolled, like a tangle of fighting demons, until it came uncomfortably near to where I and my negro guide were lying hid. It swayed away from us, returned again, rolled off, then back; and just as the Fan and I both sprang to our feet to escape from such dangerous proximity, the combatants, locked in their deadly embrace, came, crashing against us, knocking us over, and into a deep pit which we had not seen, falling upon us with a force which for an instant deprived me of consciousness. Recovering myself, however, I struggled furiously, fearing that even if the beasts had killed each other, I shonld be smothered under their bleeding carcases. I kicked, struck, and tried to push the dreadful load away. The noise above me was terrific, but I was able to distinguish my own name amidst the uproar, and it struck me that the voice in which it was pronounced was somewhat familiar. I paused in my efforts to extricate myself and listened. Again and again my name was called loudly, distinctly, and earuestly.

"John, Johu!" It was the voice of my wife whom I had left safely at home in London.

"John, Johu! Wake up, will you? You've got the nightmare, and have falleu out of bed! John, John, do get up, dear! You've dragged all the bedclothes down on the floor with you. You've rolled yourself up in them so tightly that I can't get you out. You'll be smothered if you don't wake np. Oh dear! oh dear me! Wake up, you great stupid, do!"

"Bless my soul!" said I. "How fortunate—how curious it is, too, that you should have come to my rescue so opportunely. It was very kind of you, and so courageous besides! When did you arrive out? Do you know I was wondering just as I was tumbling into this horrid pit, why the gorilla's wife didn't come to his assistance. You know she might have done it easily and safely enough, for the lion wouldn't have let go his hold, and if she bad sprung on his back sbe night have enabled her husband to freshen his grip. They might havo quickly strangled him between them. Is it not cu—"

"My goodness gracious me!" said my wife, interrupting me. "What stuff and nonsense are you talking? Lions and gorillas!—fiddlesticks! There are gorillas and lions enough in the street! Drunken women screaming, and nasty men fighting, and the police trying to take them off to the station. The noise they made woke me, and there I found you snoring and grunting and struggling on your back, and the moment I touched yon, away you floundered out of bed, rolling yourself up in the clothes, and dragging them all away with you. Oh, don't sit on the floor there, like a great donkey, with your nightcap on one side, looking so silly and ridiculous. Do get up and help me to set the clotbes straight ou the bed again."

"What!" said I. "Was it all a dream, aud is not even my noble Fan a reality?"

"Your fan, indeed!" retorted Mrs. Smith, who was beginning to lose her placidity of temper. "If you are so warm as to want a fan, you may sit up there and use mine. I'll lend it to you and welcome. But please let me have the bedclothes, for I don't want fanning. My teeth are chattering with the cold. Tbe police have takeu all the fighting and shouting and screaming gorillas and lions, male and femalo, to the station-house. The fans are in the wardrobe. Do, thero's a dear, get up off the floor. That's right."

"BORES."

THE writer spreads the foolscap and dips the pen, duly impressed with the importance and the magnitude of tho toil before him. Vast is the family, awful the influence of "Bores." Were he to contemplate a discourse on Wits, or Sages, bow short and simple would be the task!—because how few the specimens. But the Bores—the race is all-pervading, endless. We are a Bore-ridden peoplo. Bores are everywhere: in the street—in the parlor—in the boudoir—in the office. Go up in a balloon, and three to one you are sitting—a mile above the earth—with a Bore. Go down in an exploring diving-bell, and the odds are great that you are cheek-by-jowl with an animal of tho same species. You can't fly them. Forswear mankind, shut yourself up, in fact, in any hole into which the human face never peeps, and still you have uot shaken off the influence of Boredom. Still it haunts you—persecutes you. Stay alone for a bare half hour, and how great is the chance that your own thoughts, your own mental self, becomes to that self—a Bore. But it may be asked: "Would you, then, suppress Bores?" Heavens, my friends! do you take us for a second Herod, thus to suggest a new massacre of the innocents? Exterminate the Bores, indeed! We love our race, our friends, our acquaintances, our brothers and sisters of mankind better. Exterminate the Bores! Put an extinguisher on so worthy a proportion of the good souls of our great and glorious country! Reader, we are not Nero. Conceive society without Bores. Why, who in that case would write the fashionable novels, or make patriotic speeches at political meetings, or get up coucerts, lectures, subscriptions, etc., etc., for the Sanitary Fund and Soldiers' Relief Society—or talk of the American Eagle and the British Lion—or do the thousand and one things which have made America the envy of all nations and the pride and wonder of the world? No, may the Bores ever flourish! We know them, and love them, and make much of them.

It is quite a mistake to suppose that every one has a right to be a Bore. There is your uncle—your venerable, cross, peevish, bilious, charming uncle—with a large balance at the right side of his account with his banker. He comes to dine with you, and quarrels with everything on the table. Ho almost drives your wife wild by hinting that your eldest will have a snub nose and red hair. After a few glasses of wine have thawed him, he becomes simply tedious. He tells awful stories of the quarrels and diplomatic negotiations he carries on with his neighbor Brown, about Brown's dog, which has a habit of amusing itself by the monotonous recreation of howling all night in the back yard. You hear about Brown's dog every time you see your uncle. His very soul is embarked in the contest with Brown's dog. Brown's dog is a nightmare on your spirits, a stumbling-block in your way, an abomination in your nostrils; and, in the agonies of your pent-up wrath, you inwardly wish that Brown's dog may catch the hydrophobia, bite mankind in general and your venerated relative in particular. But do you breathe a word of the secret of your soul to tbe delightful, good old gentleman himself? Not you. You console yourself by abusing him to your wife at night. He is one of the privileged Bores, aud his strength lies in his purse-strings.

We have known musical gentlemen, with very long hair and a general foreign aspect, turn out very considerable Bores at a party they were invited to enliven. The professor sits down to the pianoforte; dead silence is proclaimed. A shock, as if an eagle swooped down on the keys, and away he goes full tilt iuto a short piece of sixty pages. You have been flirting with the pretty Miss Laura de Smytheree, and you whisper, "I suppose if they get an author here they make him read his book on the same principle." Tbe pianist catches your eye and Miss Laura's smile, and scowls like a melo-dramatist writing a thrilling passage.

The infliction over, yonr hostess swims up to yon. "Naughty thing that you are, don't you know how very particular the Signor is when he is playing?" In other words, the Signor is a privileged Bore. People who are so lucky as to be "just from Paris" have some title to be Bores in a party of their fellow-beings less fortunate. The claims cannot be disputed, and they can have everything their own way. Everybody will laugh at their jokes, no matter how stale, agree with their observations, and quite coincide in their opinions of the fine arts, etc. These are the people who in their conversation, pelt you so uumercifully with, "Vraiment," "Voila," Et vous," "Jamais," etc., etc. We have known professed funny gentlemen, too, with no inconsiderable touch of the privileged Bore. Smartly is an example. He can make a puu on anytbiug. Ho is asked out to be witty, and as he is very conscieutious, he never leaves off—trying. Sleepleigh is a great chemist. You are pleased to meet him, and somehow get into a semi-scientific chat together. Smartly comes up. "You talk of the effects of acid. What Cid? Racine's Cid?"

You groan at the attempt, and Sleepleigh stalks off in the sulks. Never uind, you fix on Fliut—Flint so well known as a geologist. Up comes Smartly. "What's that you were saying of Feldspar? Ha! you should have seen the Benicia Boy spar." You aro inclined to be cross. Nonsense, Smartly is a privileged Borc.

Practical-joking men are even greater nuisances than your mere word-catchers.

Look at Tomkins. He puts powder into your pipe; wakes you up at four in the morning by a false alarm of fire; puts your death in the paper, and heads a crowd to toss you in a blauket when you join a social institution for the first time. You threaten to kick Tomkins. "Nonsense," every one will say. "Nobody is angry at what Tomkins does. Absurd."

And so, through an endless number of instances, society, under certain circumstances, is always ready to tolerate a cer taiu species of Boredom. There is old Mrs. Dowager, who makes no scruple of telling you to your face that you are a particularly disagreeable person. "Oh, but," says the world, "she is so sincere—no nasty flattery about dear Mrs. D.; and besides, whatever she says is for yonr own good, if you will only take it so."

Mr. Charles Augustus Chevrons has been in the Volunteers a month. He is entitled, therefore, to dogmatize on all the battles of the war, and on the respective merits of the different commanders of the Army of the Potomac, and, if you venture to differ with bim, to put you down with a sneer: "What should a civilian know of military matters?"

Bainbridge Truxton Decatur Jones, æt. 19, has just been appointed master's mate. He talks of the hardships of a sailor's life; "capsizes" and "lays-to" everything in his conversation, and brings in "fokesel" "forra'd," "'board-ship," etc., etc., when occasion offers. He makes perilous expeditions daily from the ship's side to the wharf in the captain's gig, and is therefore the supreme authority on everything nautical from Noah down to Commodore Winslow. Should you dare to disagree with him, he will either "trice you up," "stop your allowance," or "send you aloft."

Bores all—privileged Bores all.

A TERRIBLE DEATH-BED.—M. Jules Janin told us recently an interesting anecdote of Dorat, which you must let me repeat to you as I am talking of selfishness: There was in the last century a poet named Barthe. They still play one of his comedies; Les Fausses Confidences. He was a friend of the poet Dorat. The latter, whilo young, died exhausted by every passion of debauchery and wit. There was nothing around his death-bed but faded roses, old billet-doux, ecboless elegies, misery, desertion, destitution. A decayed actress kept watch by his pillow stuffed with thorns; even the fire scarce flickered on the hearth. Oh, misery and desolation! How true is the word of the Psalmist: "Woe unto them that laugh!" Nevertheless, a man—it was Barthe—made his appearance in this solitude and silence; he had a huge roll of paper under his arm. The dying man said: "Ah, it is you! Welcome! You, of all the friends I had, are the only one who has come to bid me farewell—aud yet my chamber is uot so far from the Café Procope!" Barthe unrolled his manuscript and said: "Let me read you, friend Dorat, my new comedy in verse; it is entitled, The Egotist; or, the Selfish Fellow. I am persuaded that you will be pleased with it." Tbe invalid moaned from his bed: "But, my dear friend, don't you see I am dying? For Heaven's sake, have compassion on me!" The other man replied, "Get out! you are not half dead. Besides, my comedy is not long; in three hours I'll run through the whole of it." He smoothed his manuscript, and without pity read ou till he reacbed the end. After he had ceased to read, he waited, full sure that his work would be successful, for the invalid's compliments. Dorat said to him with his dying voice: "Add, I pray you, a scene to your Egotist; depict him coming to read a comedy to his dying friend, and going away after haviug drank the last glass of tho dying man's infusion." So saying, he turned his face to the wall, and gave up his petty, frivolous soul, aud his worthless mind. "Oh! the egotist and envious wretch!" exclaimed Barthe, as he quitted the dark chamber, and went to carry his comedy to the play-actors.—Paris Cor. Publishers' Circular.

THINGS TO BE LAUGHED AT.

Punch's advice to people about to marry—"Don't."

RADELAIS made the following will: "I owe much. I have nothing. I give the rest to the poor."

IT is not wholesome to eat red blackberries, for when they are green they are red.

BY this explosion fifty persons were mortally wonnded, of whom very few recovered.

FOOTE being scolded by a lady, said, "I have heard of tartar and brimstone: you aro the cream of the one and the flower of the other."

Little Girl (after hearing older people telling their dreams) I tried to dream and I couldn't; I couldn't think of anything to dream.

REYNOLDS, the dramatist, observing to Martin the thinness of his house at one of his own plays, added that he supposed it was owing to the war. "No," replied Martin, "I should judge it is owing to the piece."

BOILEAU used to say that tbe best epigrams originated in conversation; and of all his own he gave the prefereuce to the following:

Not less for mine than her repose.
Here lies my wife, and, Heaven knows,

SOME person whom Quin had offended met him in the street and stopped him. "Mr. Quin," said he, "I—I—I understand you have been taking away my name." "What have I said, sir?" "You—you—you called me a scoundrel, sir!" "Oh, then keep your name, sir!" replied Quin, and walked on.

JUDGE BLANK, hearing a donkey bray while Curran was arguing a case before him, said, "One at a time, Mr. Curran if you please." The speech being finished, the judge began his charge, and in its progress the ass sent forth the full force of its lungs, whereupon the advocate said, "Does not your Lordship hear a remarkable echo in the Court?"

SOME smoke was observed to issue from the roof of a house and a fear arose that the garret was on fire. Some workmen went up to see about it, and the foremost one, (an Irishman,) finding the place very dark, called out to those behind him, "Fitch a light, fitch a light, boys, to see where the fire is."

A REWARD being offered for a rhyme with Porringer, the following lines were produced:

The Duke of York, a daughter had,
He gave the Prince of Orange her;
And now my Lord I claim the prize
For making rhyme with porringer.

PROF. PORSON being once at a dinner party where the conversation turned upon Capt. Cook aud his celebrated voyages round the world, an ignorant person in order to contribute bis mite towards the social intercourse, asked him, "Pray, was Cook killed ou his first voyage?" "I believe he was," answered Porson, "though he didn't mind it much, but immediately entered on a second."

FOOTE, the dramatist, having in one of his entertainments caricatured an actor named O'Brien, that gentleman waited upon the mimic, and indignantly complained of the injury his character had sustained through his being taken off upon the stage. The comedian, having vainly endeavored to laugh his visitor into good humor, at length observed: "Well, as you seem displeased at my taking you off, you shall immediately see me take myself off!" The enraged actor was pacified; and Foote, taking up his hat, walked out of the room. O'Brien waited an hour before he saw the joke, and found that he would have to wait longer still before he should see the joker; so he, too, took himself off.

IN the olden times, when it was customary in many parts of New England to sing the psalms and hymns by deaconing them, as it was called—that is, by the deacon's reading each line previous to its being sung, one of these church dignitaries, after looking at his book some time and making several attempts to spell the words, apologized for the difficulty he experienced in reading, by observing,: "My eyes, indeed are very blind." The choir, who had been impatiently waiting for a whole line, thinking this to be the first of a common metre hymn, immediately sang it. The good deacon exclaimed, with emphasis, "I cannot see at all." This they also sung, when the astonished pillar of the church cried out, "I really believe you are bewitched," and "The mischief in you all." The choir finished the verse by echoing the last lines, and the deacon sat down in despair.

A FOREIONER named Vogel, a celebrated flute-player, advertised a concert for his benefit, and in order to attract those who had no music in their souls, and were not moved by the concord of sweet sounds, he announced that between the acts he would exhibit an extraordinary feat, never before witnessed in Europe. He would hold in his left hand a glass of wine, and would allow six of the strongest men in the town to hold his arm, and, notwithstanding all their efforts to prevent him, would drink the wine. So novel and surprising a display of strength, as it was naturally regarded, attracted a very crowded house, and expectatiou was on the tiptoe. when our hero appeared on the stage, glass in hand, and politely iuvited any half-dozen of the audience to come forward to put his prowess to the test. Several gentlemen, amongst whom was the Mayor of the place, immediately advanced to the stage, and, grasping the left arm of Vogel, apparently rendered the promised feat quite out of the question. There was an awful pause for a moment, when our arm-bound hero, eyeing the gentlemen who had piuioned him, said, in his broken English: "Shenteelmen, are you all ready? Are you quite suro you have got fast hold?" The answer having been given in the affirmative by a very confident nod from those to whom it was addressed, Vogel, to the infinite amusement of the spectators and to the no small surprise of the group around him, advancing his right arm, which was free, very coolly took the wine glass from his left hand, and bowing very politely to the half-dozen gentlemeu, said; Shenteelmeu, I have de honor to drink all your goot health;" at the same time quaffing off the wine amidst a general roar of laughter and uuiversal cries of "Bravo! bravo! Well done, Vogel!" It cannot be denied that Vogel literally redeemed his pledge. The condition was that his arm should be held; but not a word was said about his hand. Ho very ingeniously availed himself of the oversight, nor could be be fairly charged with resortiug to a trick or subterfuge.

IN MEMORY OF A FRIEND.

IN April of last year the Rev. Lewis C. Bayles came to this coast. The same steamer which brought him brought the writer of this article. The voyage was the first which marked the reopening of the Nicaraguan Transit Line, and it was a long and tedious one. Under any circumstances a steamer becomes recognizedly the home of those who have passage in it, and friendships are formed during a sea-voyage similar to those which are formed around firesides. The solitude of the surrounding ocean and the close companionship into which travellers are brought, begets a sympathy between those who on shore perhaps would have moved in widely different orbits, and attachments are formed which time and after-separation cannot efface. Mr. Bayles won the hearts of all on board by his genial nature, his true Christian character, and his high scholarly attainments. He mingled in the amusements which were originated to beguile the voyage; his kind heart manifested itself on all occasions in efforts to befriend those about him, and his true and tender piety won many to his society who before had a very inadequate idea of what religion was, or of the rightful sphere in which a clergyman might be useful. There was no concession on his part towards the world, but he won worldliness towards him by the magnetism of his warm heart. In the cabin, in the steerage, he was always busy, never unmindful of an opportunity of doing good, never neglectful on any occasion of his Master's interest. Divine service was each Sabbath held, Mr. Bayles officiating, and serious and attentive audiences listened to his sermons. Among the idle loiterers whom the ship's bell gathered from deck, forecastle and all parts of the vessel, the young preacher stood up, his tall form towering above the stature of his hearers and his eye glowing as he pointed out to them the beauties of religion, and enunciated in tones which fell like a benediction the truths which upheld his own steps through the Valley of the Shadow and enabled him finally to go to his rest like one who lies down to pleasant dreams. He will long be remembered by his fellow-travellers, even after, perhaps, his memory shall have faded from the hearts of his immediate congregation in this city.

Bringing letters from Eastern churches, soon after his arrival here he was intrusted by the Rev. Dr. Anderson, who was then leaving for a brief season of rest from pastoral labors, with the care of the First Presbyterian Church. His health made a suspension of labor necessary, and he travelled through the interior of the State, viewing the wonders which the God he worshipped had wrought in mountain and valley, subsequently taking an excursion of three months' duration to the Sandwich Islands. He returned seemingly strengthened and nerved for his duties, but hemorrhage of the lungs attacked him the third week after his reoccupancy of the pulpit. On the night of Monday last his pure spirit passed away, and on the following Wednesday he was laid to rest forever. Kind hands attended him through his sickness and during his last moments, and strewed white lilies and rosebuds, as spotless as his faith, upon his coffin. He sleeps in Lone Mountain, and never did the grave's emerald gates open to receive the casket of a purer, nobler soul. In his twenty-sixth year, with his armor but just buckled on, his helmet scarcely adjusted for the fight, he was called home by his Master for a nearer service. The ways of Providence are inscrutable, and mortals may not question the fiat of Him who doeth all well. He sleeps, and lightly lay the turf above him!

SUTTEE.—The young widow's earthly career was now drawing rapidly to a close. A few moments more, and she would be suffering the most horrible of deaths. But her eye quailed not, nor did her lips quiver. She ascended the fatal pile as if it had been her bridal bed; and stretched herself beside the loathsome corpse—already in an advanced stage of decay—she clasped it in her arms, and rested her beautiful head on the breast which was literally a weltering mass of corruption. It was fearful to behold the living and the dead thus united; to contrast the rounded limbs and graceful figure of that fair girl, with the bloated, grinning corpse which she held in her embrace. My heart sickened at the sight, and a feeling of deadly faintness came over me; but I had strength to see the tragedy completed. I was close to the pile, and watched the poor victim's countenance narrowly; it was pale as death but perfectly placid. She never moved a muscle, and appeared more like a marble, or rather bronze, image than a living being. Even on the brink of eternity, with the prospect of so fearful death before her eyes, the fortitude inspired by a blind and devoted superstition supported her through the trial. When all the preparations were completed, a horrid yell was raised, and a number of men rushed with lighted torches towards the pile, shouting, dancing and screaming like demons. In an instant the whole was in flames. Heaps of burning straw fell on the two bodies. The death-shriek of the wretched victim was drowned amidst the roar of a thousand voices. The bickering flames rose high above the pile. All was one glowing mass of fire, and the poor creature's sufferings were ended. Once I saw her struggle, but it was only for a moment, and, dreadful though her agony must have been, it could not have lasted above a few seconds. The wind was high, and the dry wood burned with such fury that in a few minutes more than half of the pile was consumed, and no one would have guessed that two human bodies were smouldering in the midst of it.—*My Indian Journal. POISONOUS PLAYTHINGS FOR CHILDREN.

WHEN a few children are killed by the mixture of some poison in sugar sticks, brandy-balls, peppermint-sticks, marshals' staffs, pink ladies, and fifty other confections that children are better acquainted with than the writer, a Coroner's inquest is held, and for a time the unwholesome materials are disused, and the sweetmeats are made more wholesome, although they are less brilliant to the eye. But, besides the articles above referred to, other poisonous snares for children beset them in all directions. It is extraordinary what a great want of common care and knowledge is shown by thousands who have the charge of children, and whose duty it is to protect them from these and other dangers. Amongst those matters which require attention are the color-boxes which are provided for the use of children. We have some of these before us of several prices, ranging from 1d. to 6d., and 1s. 6d., and in nearly every instance the colors are composed of the most poisonous preparations of lead and other dangerous minerals; amongst these are the various shades of green, a small portion of which will destroy life. Infant artists are almost invariably addicted to the bad practice of putting both paints and brushes into the mouth; and, in consequence, we have disordered stomachs, which often can in no way be accounted for; and there is no doubt that by this means promise of future excellence in art is sometimes nipped in the bud.

It is the same with other toys. The younger the child, the stronger is the impression that all playthings are good to eat; and this predilection should be especially borne in mind in the preparation of toys. It is, therefore, the duty of the custodians of children to repudiate all toys decorated with poisonous colors, especially when these can be removed by sucking. Persons may daily see india-rubber balls which have been thickly covered with coatings of vermilion and chromates of lead, which can easily be removed by the mouth or damp fingers: these are solid balls; but some time since, the death of some children was traced to poisoning caused by the colored gutta-percha air-balls. After the mischance referred to, the colored balls went almost entirely out of market, and the clear transparent balls came into general use. Now we perceive that the poisonous tinting of the inside of these balls is again making its appearance, and we fear that the coroner's inquiry respecting these articles will be called for again before long; for it is the practice of the little boys and girls, when the air-balls have burst, to tear the materials into pieces, to moisten the portions in the mouth, and form little balls, which they cause to explode. In doing this, the poisonous coloring is often swallowed, and in certain instances sickness and death take place. In many other ways there is danger, to a greater or lesser extent; as one instance, in the little colored prints, which are cut up and put into books and pricked in a lottery; the children who win have a practice of wetting the pictures with the tongue, and transferring the objects represented to the back of the hands, face, etc.; during this operation, a considerable quantity of the paint (which is of a description similar to that in bad color-boxes above referred to) is swallowed, and the consequence is, that from this cause we have more unaccountable sickness.

In the Noah's arks, in the farm-yards, in the bright green coats of the Foresters, and in fifty other ways, there is danger to the lives and health of children. Now, there is no necessity for this. To a large extent vegetable colors, which are very telling and harmless, might be selected and used instead of the mineral preparations. In the Swiss toys this provision is, to a considerable extent, attended to; and, with taste, cochineal, indigo, and various yellows and siennas are used with good effect, and can do no damage.

Often the eye, as well as the stomach, is deranged by ill-colored toys: we have seen some so horrible in their want of harmony, that it has been a matter of pain to look at them. This fault, we fear, can only be very gradually removed; but as regards the preparation of poisonous toys, when death can be shown to have resulted from the use of them, the persons who are implicated in their sale should meet with due punishment.—London Builder.

THE MYTHOLOGY OF PEAS.—The mythology of peas is very curious, but still somewhat obscure. This much, however, is certain, that the plant and its fruit are in some way or other related to celestial fire. It may be that they were regarded in this light because they belong to the class of creeping and climbing plants to which such relations were pre-eminently attributed; at all events, the fact that they too represented something in the vegetation of the sky is substantiated by numerous details in their mythical history. The dragons that poison the air and the waters carry peas in their flight, and let them fall in such quantities that they fill up the wells to the brim, and their smell is so foul that the cattle refuse to eat them. These peas are the lightning that seemed, as appears from a multitude of traditions, to fall in drops or pellets, and their smell is the sulphurous stench that clings to whatever else the dragon brings, and to the gifts thrown down by the wild huntsman. The Zwergs, who are closely connected with Thor, and who forged for him his lightning hammer, are exceedingly fond of peas, as every husbandman knows to his cost, whose pea fields they plunder under cover of their caps of darkness. Peas were sacred to Thor himself, and even now, in Berlin, peas with sauerkraut are a standing dish on Thor's own day, Thursday. That they are typical of lightning is further proved by their being used in the same manner as the thunderbolt and as hazel nuts to promote the fertility of seed corn. In Swabia and elsewhere peas are boiled over the St. John's fire, and eaten dry out of the hollow of the hand. They are thought to be good against all sorts of complaints, and particularly against wounds and bruises. It is also recommended that children in the measles should be washed with water in which peas have been boiled.—Kelly's Indo-European Tradition and Folk-Lore.

MRS. BLANK desired Dr. Johnson to give his opinion of a new work she had just written; adding that if it would not do, she begged him to tell her, for she had other irons in the fire; and in case of its not being likely to succeed, she could bring out something else. "Then," said the doctor, after having turned over a few of the leaves, "I advise you, madam, to put it where your other irons are."

A REMEDY FOR SORROW.—In one of his plays, Addison makes an undertaker thus upbraid a mute who had laughed at a funeral: "You rascal, you, I have been raising your wages for the last two years, on condition that you appear more sorrowful, and the higher wages you receive the happier you look."

MONUMENT TO COLUMBUS.—The Spanish Cortes have just passed a law empowering the government to make arrangements with the Municipality of Madrid for the erection of a colossal bronze statue of Christopher Columbus in one of the public places of the city. It is proposed to inscribe on the pedestal the device of the Dukes de Veraguas, the great discoverer's descendants, as follows:

"A Castilla y á Leon Nueva mundo dio Colon."

(To Castile and Leon, Columbus gave the New World.)

FEMALE FRIENDSHIP.—A curious trial is coming off at the Lincoln assizes. A married woman of the name of Martha Howell had fallen, it appears, so desperately in love with a young woman of the name of Johnson, living at Gainesborough, that after various fits of wild jealousy and violence caused by Miss Johnson's preference for other companions, she loaded a pistol and gave her her choice between returning to her old friendship or dying on the spot, after which Martha Howell intended to destroy herself. She put too much powder into the pistol, which jerked it upwards, so that when the pistol went off Miss Johnson escaped, but of the intention to kill there can be no doubt. Howell is said to be quite composed and clear in her mind, and to have expressed frequently her regret that she did not succeed, and her perfect willingness to be hanged if she had. Women's enthusiasm for each other is often of a vehement, frothy, and hysterical kind; but the "Your love or your life" sort of passion was, we thought, reserved for another relation.—London paper, July 2.

BULLYING A BULLY.—Joe Haines, the actor, once played off a practical joke on a parson, by pretending to appoint him chaplain to the players, which led to some unseemly equivoques. The parson happened to have a son, a member of the thrasonical family, a talking bully, and, of course, a coward; but he vowed publicly to avenge the trick put upon his father. Accordingly, he watched Joe from rehearsal one day, and, swaggering up, desired him to draw. Joe demanded to know why, and they adjourned to a tavern that he might be told. Joe, receiving the information, consented at once, but said, "I am a religious man, and must have five minutes to say my prayers." He then retired to the next room, and in a loud tone, distinctly heard by his challenger, expressed his repentance for killing seventeen persons in duels, and concluded by asking forgiveness for being obliged to add this unhappy gentleman to the list. The other, looking on his fee-simple of life as not worth a moment's purchase, ran down stairs, and left Joe to pay the reckoning.

FOUR JEALOUS WOMEN PACIFIED.—When the famous pas de quatre was projected, it was thought by all that the jealousies of the rival danseuses, Taglioni, Carlotta Grisi, Cerito and Lucille Grahn would prevent its being ever executed, but Mr. Lumley found a way of getting out of the dilemma:

Let no one (says he, in his Reminiscences of the Opera, just published) undervalue the magnitude of this tremendous task. I was informed by a well-known diplomatist that, when the preparations for the solemnities and festivities attendant upon the Coronation of the Emperor of Austria as King of Lombardy, at Milan, were placed in his hands, the settlement of a pas de deux, to be danced by Carlotta Grisi and Cerito, (although then comparatively mere tyros of the Scala,) cost him a hundred-fold more trouble than all the other complicated arrangements of the festival. All was at length adjusted. Satisfaction was in every mind; the pas de quatre was rehearsed—was announced; the very morning of the event had arrived; no further hindrances were expected. Suddenly, while I was engaged with the lawyers in my own room, deeply occupied with the final arrangements for my purchase of the opera-house (of which more hereafter,) poor Perrot rushed unannounced into my presence in a state of intense despair. Without regard for the serious conclave assembled, he uttered frantic exclamations, tore his hair and at last found breath to say that all was over—that the pas de quatre had fallen to the ground and never could be given! With difficulty the unfortunate ballet-master was calmed down to a sufficient state of reason to be able to explain the cause of his anguish. The completion of the purchase of the opera-house was suspended for a few minutes and the explanation, as follows:

When all was ready I had desired Perrot to regulate the order in which the separate pas of each danseuse should come. The place of honor, the last in such cases, (as in regal processions,) had been ceded without overmuch hesitation to Mlle. Taglioni. Of the remaining ladies who claimed equal rights, founded on talent and popularity, neither would appear before the other. "Mon Dieu!" exclaimed the ballet-master in distress, "Cerito ne veut pas commencer avant Carlotta—ni Carlotta avant Cerito, et il n'y a pas moyen de les faire bouger; tout est fini!" "The solution is easy," said I to poor Perrot. "The question of talent must be decided by the public. But in this dilemma there is one point on which I am sure the ladies will be frank. Let the oldest take her unquestionable right to the envied position." The ballet-master smote his forehead, smiled assent, and bounded from the room upon the stage. The judgment of the manager was announced. The ladies tittered, laughed, drew back, and were now as much disinclined to accept the right of position as they had been before eager to claim it. The ruse succeeded. The management of the affair was left in M. Perrot's hands. The order of the ladies being settled, the grand pas de quatre was finally performed on the same night before a delighted audience, who little knew how nearly they had been deprived of their expected treat.

MANY a fool passes for a clever man, because he knows how to hold his tongue; and many a clever man passes for a fool, because he doesn't know how to use it.

AN ADVANCE MOVEMENT.—It is now fully established that a change has taken place in certain quarters which will captivate whole households, and is attracting the attention of the many interested. We refer more particularly to Grover & Baker, who seem to have scaled the walls of perfection, and are now furnishing sewing machines, which not only sew all varieties of fabric most perfectly, but enter into the accomplishment, and with the same machine execute the most elaborate and elegant embroidery. Mothers will hail with delight this contribution to their comfort, and avail themselves of an opportunity to examine these great improvements at the rooms of this enterprising firm.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following notices reach us from the Eastern press:

We have received the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly journal just started in San Francisco, under the editorial charge of Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman well known to New York journalism. Mr. Webb was for several years attached to the editorial staff of the New York Times, where he occupied the responsible post of literary editor, and where his criticisms were the object of special remark for their freshness and piquancy. His new enterprise, THE CALIFORNIAN, bears the impress of his editorial skill on every page. It is a handsome paper of sixteen pages, about the size of the Round Table before it was cut down, and not unlike that journal in character and scope. It is printed upon a quality of paper which in these days seems almost prodigally fine. If such a journal can be sustained in California it is certainly a good token for the literary taste of the land of gold. At all events judging from the first number, no man is more capable of directing its career in a successful path than its projector and editor.—Boston Transcript.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new literary paper with this title comes to us from San Francisco. It is refreshing to the eyes of a printer to read its beautiful print upon clean white paper, and its contents are rich and varied, bearing mark of care and scholarship, enlivened with a vein of humor, that promises for it a position in the first rank of our native publications. It is edited by Charles H. Webb, Esq., formerly of the New York Times, and latterly the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, whose department of racy "Things" in that paper was read with delight by every one this way on whom the Era dawned. "Things"—snappy and epigrammatic as ever—have a place in THE CALIFORNIAN, and we would press upon our readers that they could do no better than send on and subscribe for it. The paper bears at its head the motto, appropriate for its own character, as well as for the State: "Surely there is a vein for the silver and a place for the gold where they fine it."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly journal just started in San Francisco, is a remarkably handsome paper of sixteen pages, printed in a superior manner and made up of editorial and selected matter indicating ability and excellent judgment. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a well-known New York journalist, is the editor, and he seems to have entered upon his work with a vigor that, if continued, will render his paper inferior to no literary newspaper in America. Mr. Webb has gained a name for freshness, piquancy and spirit in his writings, and will undoubtedly make THE CALIFORNIAN a household friend not in San Francisco only but in every Eastern city.—Boston Post.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published in a handsome quarto form, and conducted by Mr. C. H. Webb, formerly one of the editors of the New York Times. Mr. Webb is a pleasant and versatile writer, and won an excellent reputation during his experience of journalism in this city. He went to California one or two years ago, but ventured for the first time upon an independent enterprise in May last, when the first number of the CALIFORNIAN appeared. The paper claims to be "devoted to live topics and the best interests of California," and inasmuch as it shows a disposition to redeem this promise, being very lively and honest, it deserves success.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The following are a few of the notices which have appeared in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the CALIFORNIAN is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest publication known to us. The CALIFORNIAN is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call. June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best bow on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-bred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

THE first number of the CALIFORNIAN, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The CALIFORNIAN contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

CALIFORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the CALIFORNIAN, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

And the following we clip from the country exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the name of a new weekly literary paper which is to make its début in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the business affairs of his journal properly, it is sure to succeed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attainments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. The journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the CALIFORNIAN appears to be, and if the publisher will send us his journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have received the second number of the new hebdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under the above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The high literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgment displayed in its selections, and its neat typographical execution, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a large and neatly printed weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" the first number from our table before we had examined it; the second number, however, is before us, and we find it filled with reading matter, original and selected, of the highest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured that they will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat and plain in typography, and gives evidence of the best of editorial talent.—Placerville Weekly News.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever ; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds : "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which by some injudicious prescription had been converted into an asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

For that is an article calculated to remove rather than to produce asthmatic affections. And as for COUGHS AND COLDS, the world never saw a better remedy, and never will, until nature produces some new ingredient out of which to prepare it Don't be afraid to use it freely. Every article in it is from nature's own laboratory—the same today as they were a thousand years ago—all calculated to soothe, heal and strengthen. There is no

BETTER FAMILY MEDICINE!

Keep it in the house, use it freely yourself, and give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold. By so doing you may save yourself many days and nights of care, anxiety and watchfulness so inseparably connected with the chamber of the sick jy2

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, DR. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be treated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute. Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Headricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

NOTHINGS.

THE point in regard to which, as a citizen of San Francisco, I am chiefly proud of this metropolis of the North Pacific, is not its rapid growth, nor its great wealth, nor export of treasure, nor its dozen lines of steamers, nor its striking history in the past, nor its brilliant promise for the future, nor its vast encroachments upon the sea, nor its wharves nor its ships, not its theatres nor its churches, nor its silver mining stocks nor its street railroads, but, far above all these, its Mercantile Library. The thirst for the almighty dollar, and the confusion of our unsettled social condition did not avail to prevent the establishment and liberal encouragement of an institution which, at the same time, educates and elevates the people. It was not endowed by a rich man and pressed upon a reluctant people; it was not founded by a few for the benefit of a small class. It was founded by a large number of citizens for the equal benefit of all. Here are 20,000 volumes in a library, the current expenses of which, amounting to $18,000, are borne by 1,500 subscribers. One-tenth of the voters of San Francisco are able and willing to pay $1 per month to the principal public library. If any other city in the world can show as favorable a record as that for every fifteen years of its existence, I would like to see it. It must be remembered, too, that a large portion of the citizens of San Francisco are foreigners who are not very familiar with our language, and that there are three or four other public libraries, beside several circulating libraries.

The following paragraph which I clip from a newspaper suits me so well that I will just adopt it here:

THE BLESSING OF A GREAT LIBRARY.

A great library is of incalculable benefit to any community. It saves infinite waste of time to the thinker, by enabling him to know what has already been thought. It is of greater advantage (and that advantage is of a higher kind) than any seminary of learning, for it supplies the climate and atmosphere, without which good seed is sowed in vain. It is not merely that books are the "precious life-blood of master spirits," and to be prized for what they contain, but they are still more useful for what they prevent. The more a man knows, the less will he be apt to think he knows, the less rash will he be in conclusion, and the less hasty in utterance. It is of great consequence to the minds of most men how they begin to think, and many an intellect has been lamed irretrievably, for steady and lofty flight, by toppling out into the helpless void of opinion with wings yet callow. Good books are the enemies of delusion, the most efficient extinguishers of self-conceit. Impersonal, dispassionate, self-possessed, they reason without temper, and forever of the same mind, without obstinacy. The man who has the freedom of a great library, lengthens his own life without the weariness of living; he may include all past generations in his experience without risk of senility; not yet fifty, he may have made himself the cotemporary of "the world's gray fathers;" and with no advantages of birth or person, he may have been admitted to the selectest society of all times and lands.

THE MORAL BENEFITS OF A LIBRARY.

That writer—and his name is unknown to me—dwells chiefly upon the intellectual benefit; but the moral advantages are also great. The man who has acquired a taste for reading—and the more a man reads the more he wants to read—can never be miserable so long as he has books within reach. Our literature has become so extensive in quantity, so varied in quality, and so rich in information, that even the good books have become inexhaustible—that is, no one man can possibly master them all. There is, therefore, always something new, and not only new but important, to be learned; and while a man can learn, his attention is excited, his interest is maintained, his mind is delighted. Why should I ever seek the company of the ignorant or the base—why should I spend my time in idleness or weariness, when a thousand great men are constantly inviting me to sit down with them and listen to the teachings of their experience or the results of their life-long studies? Having once learned to learn, I am protected against all possible misfortunes, and my intellectual development is limited only by the want of leisure for study or of books to read.

ADAM'S CONDUCT IN EATING THE APPLE.

I have on various occasions seen learned disquisitions on what would have been the result if some great event which did happen had not happened: for instance, if Grouchy had arrived at Waterloo before Blucher; or if the Athenians had crushed Sparta in the Peloponnesian war, or if Hannibal had taken Rome when he advanced to its gates. But there is a greater problem than any of these. What would have happened if Adam had refused to eat the other half of the apple? Would he have remained in Paradise, and the human race have enjoyed uninterrupted happiness? Whatever answer might be given to those questions, I cannot but feel grateful to Adam for eating his half. I take it for granted that he understood all the consequences of his act. The common principles of justice require that no punishment shall be inflicted except in accordance with previous notification for an offense expressly prohibited. If the amount of the punishment is not fairly stated, the offender can complain of deception. The Courts cannot inflict a punishment greater than that stated in the law. And we read in Genesis that full notification was given to Adam. In the face of that notification, without any unmanly scolding, without delay or hesitation—with no attempt to dodge his inevitable fate—he composedly took that great bite which decided the fate of humanity through all ages. The heroism of Codrus, Mutius Scevola and Arnold Winkelried sinks into insignificance as compared with that of the great father of the race. Human nature was already pretty well developed. Better woman without Paradise than Paradise without woman. Those were Adam's sentiments. Those are my sentiments. Those are the sentiments of every man that is a man. If Adam's choice were offered to me to-day I verily believe that I have enough of his blood in me to do as he did. I will call my first boy "Adam," and when he gets big enough I well tell him why.

Of course, I accept the story as literally true.

KEINMANN.

THE Paris Constitutionnel is responsible for a pleasing tale of Chinese life. He boldly avers that a Yankee was very politely invited by a Chinese merchant to make him a visit at his house, and that the host overwhelmed his guest with the most extravagant hospitality; even providing for him a splendid sort of throne in his best room, and inviting a continual concourse of his friends to pay their respects to the distinguished stranger. The house swarmed from morning till night, with courteous, obsequious and admiring Chinamen, till Brother Jonathan—notwithstanding that just appreciation of his own deserts which is one of the inalienable privileges of every true democrat, began to feel almost abashed by the homage which he received. But, alas! vanity of vanities! as all bright things come to confusion, one day the Yankee, having picked up a rudimentary knowledge of the Chinese tongue, stopped on entering his friend's abode to peruse a magnificent inscription over the door, which he found to run as follows:

Here will be found a real live North American; a species of creature rare in this country. Admission 2 cents, payable on going out.

Chinamen are not the only ones who turn their guests to account. Lord Fitznoodle isn't invited out for nothing when he comes to this republican country. In some way or another he is made to earn his victuals.

WINTERING.

I KNOW of a quaint old farmer,
More than threescore years and ten,
With a lighter heart and warmer
Than the most of younger men;
One blithsome and free as the brooklet
That gurgles through the glen.

He rises at the peep of day
With the very earliest bird,
And leads his cows to pasture
With some magical, queer word;
And the scented dew of the clover
Is first by his brisk feet stirred.

He has a child's complexion,
Like delicate tinted wax;
But the limbs are rough and hardy
That shoulder the old axe,
And the hair that drifts o'er his forehead
Is bleached like the threads of flax.

Tho young trees fall a-quiveriug,
Tho chip-pilo grows anew,
Though he says he will aever burn them,
Or, if any, very few;
For he knows he will never winter
Another season through.

You may see him in the spring-time,
When the first young violets peep,
Preparing seed for a harvest
For other hands to reap;
For he knows the snows of winter
Will find him fast asleep.

Yon may find him in the summer-day
Before the noontide heat,
With birch and spice-wood leaves, and flowers,
And herries on strings of wheat;
And crowds of children, crazy with joy,
Dancing around his feet

Oh, lightsome, happy, happy hours,
When such a little thing
As strawberries in a birch-bark cup,
Or raspberries on a string,
Shall set the young feet wild with glee,
And the young heart fluttering.

Yon may see him in tho autumn,
When tho hickory-nuts hail down,
And chestnuts open their burry lips
And show their teeth of brown,
Gathering herbs for the sick, or uuts
For the children of the town.

Passing a field of yellow corn
He will heave a little sigh,
And say he thinks his husking time
Is very, very nigh,
When the Angel of Death shall take his soul
And throw the old husk by.

I think you will see this good old man
Full ten long years from now,
Just ready to go as soon as the hay
Is gathered in the mow,
Or, at farthest, when the apples
Are shaken from the bough.

Ever wearing the trusting look
Of a little child at prayers;
And when the noiseless messenger
Steals on him unawares,
It will only seem like a toil laid by,
And a dying away of cares.

EMILIE LAWSON.

DOUGLAS JERROLD.—One of the most touching and at the same time witty things said by the late Douglas Jerrold we do not remember to have seen before. If it has already received the imprimatur it will bear repetition. One evening Jerrold was at a party where several other literary men and publishers were assembled, and the conversation turned on epitaphs. Jerrold gave his opinion that an epitaph should not consist of more than one or two words including the name. When the laugh had subsided, for no one dreamed he was in earnest, Charles Knight who was present, handed a piece of paper and a pencil to Jerrold, and begged him to write his (Knight's) epitaph. Jerrold took the paper and wrote down two simple words, "Good night!"

MR. LOTHARIO'S APOLOGY.

YOUR coming in last night, my love,
Was something sudden; I was helping Nell
To tie the ribbons of her rigolette;
She put the crimson of her mouth up—well,
I'm flesh and blood, and then you, singing, came Into the room and tossed your head for shame.

I saw a sort of maiden northern lights
Shoot up your cheeks and tremble in your eyes;
I like such things. I like to see the wind
Drive frightened clouds across tempestuous skies;
I like the sea, and, when it's easily had,
A very pretty woman, very mad!

I liked the dangerous and the regal air
(You bear a Queen's name and a Queen you are,)
With which you donned your Thibet opera cloak,
And clasped it with a diamond like a star;
'Twas charming in my mistress. But my life,
It would not be so charming in my wife.

I like wild things, as I have said, but then
I should not like to own them. Who would be
Proprietor of earthquakes or loose hurricanes,
Or comets plunging in celestial sea?
Or wed a maid that could, if she should please,
Give him a taste of one and all of these?

Not I. Don't let a female thunder-storm
Brood in your eyes, with every now and then
A flash of angry lightning. You have had
Your March and April, now be June again;
And let your fine-cut eye brows' silken span
Be bows of promise to your favorite man!

I've had my laugh, and you your pout, and now
(You'll spoil that rosebud if you twist it so,)
Give me both hands, that I may say, "Good Bess,
The good Queen Bess," and kiss you ere I go—
The good Queen Bess, whose heart and mind and face
Teach me to love ALL women as a race!

So when I kissed your pretty cousin Nell
I honored one who taught me to admire
Fair women in their twenties—don't you see!
But then, dear Bess, as I was standing by her,
Her lips quite close—now this is entre nous—
Upon my soul I made believe 'twas you!

HOOD'S HUMOR.

THERE is so much of interest in the writings of Thomas Hood that one needs to read his complete works before he is satisfied to drop his acquaintance with the author. And when at last the delightful task is accomplished, a sigh will escape from the deepest chambers of his heart that one so genial, so kind, so charitable, so sparkling, so humorous in all his life, should have suffered so much from pain, curse, and anxiety while with us, wearing himself out in the prime of life, and to

"The peace and bliss beyond the grave," while yet much of the work which he had marked out for himself remained unaccomplished. All who know the poet and author will feel that in his death humanity sustained a great loss; will feel that generations may pass by before we shall have another poet who will sing for us "the Song of the Shirt," the "Bridge of Sighs," the "Lay of the Laborer;" will love to weave wreaths of laurel and forget-me-nots around the monument at Kensal Green; will go up and down the Rhine with more of interest and pleasure from remembering Hood's many books written on the banks of that pleasure-seeking stream; while those who advocate the rights of authors, and believe in the law of copyright, will ever thank him for his Athenæum letters.

Hood was not altogether a "funny man." We are apt, only knowing authors from their writings, to form very many ideas in relation to their real characters and feelings. Perhaps you would smile if I should tell you that Hood was a serious man; that his face had a sober, at times almost painful expression; that when his picture was first given to the public there were doubts about its being received as genuine.

Writing to a friend, he says:

"By-the-bye: did I ever tell you of my Italian teacher at Coblenz, and his emetic? He took it over night, but after an hour or so, feeling very comfortable, he began to get very uncomfortable; so he drank a quantity of tea which stayed with the emetic. Still more uncomfortable because he was so comfortable; he then took warm water at intervals, which made him as comfortably uncomfortable as ever. Then, getting a little nervous, he took some wine. No discomfort except the comfort. Then warm water again. Still only mentally uncomfortable, till finally, having spent the night in this manner, he comfortably took his breakfast, which acted, as the sailors say, 'like a stopper over all.'"

That was a stomach to delight Franklin; for, as poor Robin says—

"Get what you can,
And what you get, hold!"

I wonder none of the quack doctors have got up an infallible nostrum against the sea malady. It would be sure, one would think, of a sail. One can almost fancy a little dialogue.

Passenger—"Well, doctor, I have tried your sea-sick remedy."

Doctor—"Well, and how did it turn out?"

Having been sick, he writes to a friend:

"Tom and Fanny" (his children) "are quite well; poor, dear things, they are the only comforts I have in my loneliness—namely, by making them sit still because I can't walk about. And that is such a comfort (if you ask the philosophers) to crusty people. My poor legs! I must go and stick them in the sand, as the piles are, to get muscles to 'em!"

It was one of Hood's greatest delights to torment his wife, if that were a possible thing, for she bore all his humor and love for fun with the best of feelings. Among other things, if Mrs. Hood was so thoughtless as to leave a half-finished letter upon her writing-desk, or anywhere outside of a lock and key, Thomas would either finish it for her or interline it until the original sense was sadly perverted. Mrs. Hood commenced a letter to Lieut. De Franck; and leaving it unfinished, Hood wrote as follows:

"Hood will copy at the end the directions to be sent on the box. I am pretty well—much the same as Hood; but my wife is not over-strong, neither is Jane; and Mrs. Hood seems to be no better than she is; but I expect she will mend, and so does Hood. As to Johnny, he is as well as can be expected; but Hood does not expect he shall ever be very strong again, so we must all make the best of it; the editor and all, who seem to sympathize in his ailments with me, Hood and Johnny; but he cannot expect to be better than we are, for he and we have the same complaint, a sort of monthly eruption, which we think is better 'out' than in. My wife, Jane and Mrs. Hood, call it the 'Magazine.' It is a sort of black and white literary wash, of a poisoned nature, affecting the head. As yet none of the children have caught it." To this Mrs. Hood adds:

"What a rigmarole Hood has written during my absence; but you are used to his tricks."

Another letter to De Franck shared a worse fate, for Hood peppered it all through with words of his own, as the following extract will show:

"My Dear Franck—We quite wonder at not hearing from you. I wrote to you at Ham (Hum) very soon after we were settled here, and begged (bagged) you to let us know the source (sauce) for sending you the Comic (chronic), also to inquire what fishing (flirting) tackle you wished to have, or if the needles (noodles) would be too late. I repeat all this in case (cake) you may not have received my letter (butter). As you did not write, we began to speculate on the chance of your coming (coursing) over with his Majesty; and on the day of his arrival, and for one or two days after, we expected you to walk in. Hood even saw a Prussian (Parmesan) cloak (maggot) come down the road (mad) and made (snake) sure you were the man in it," etc.

In a letter written in 1843 to the secretaries of the bazaar committee, for the benefit of the Manchester Athenæum, Hood writes some very fine things, among others these:

"At the very least my books kept me aloof from the ring, the dog-pit, the tavern, and the saloons, with their degrading orgies. For the closest associate of Pope and Addison the mind, accustomed to the noble, though silent discourse of Shakspeare and Milton, will hardly seek or put up with low company and slang. We reading animals will not be content with the brutish wallowings that satisfy the unlearned pigs of the world. Later experience enables me to depose to the comfort and blessings that literature can prove in seasons of sickness and sorrow. How powerfully intellectual pursuits can help in keeping the head from crazing, and the heart from breaking; nay, not to be too grave, how generous mental food can atone for a meagre diet; rich fare on the paper for short commons on the cloth.

"Poisoned by the malaria of the Dutch marshes, my stomach, for many months, resolutely set itself against fish, flesh, or fowl. My appetite had no more edge than the German knife placed before me. But luckily the mental palate and digestion were still sensible and vigorous, and whilst I passed untasted every dish at the Rhenish table d'hote, I could still enjoy my 'Peregrine Pickle,' and the feast after the manner of the ancients. There was no yearning towards calf's head a la tortue, or sheep's heart; but I could relish Head a la Brunnen, and the 'Heart of Mid-Lothian.' Still more recently it was my misfortune, with a tolerable appetite, to be condemned to sentence-fair, like Sancho Panza, by my physician, to a diet in fact, lower than any prescribed by the Poor-Law Commissioners; all animal food, from a bullock to a rabbit, being strictly interdicted, as well as all fluids stronger than that which lays dust, washes pinafores, and waters polyanthuses. But the feast of reason and the flow of soul were still mine. Denied beef, I had Bulwer and Cowper. Forbidden mutton, there was Lamb; and in lieu of pork, the great Bacon, or Hogg. Then, as to strong beverage, it was hard, doubtless, for a Christian to set his face, like a Turk, against the juice of the grape. But, eschewing wine, I had still my Butler; and in the absence of liquor, all the choice of spirits from Tom Brown to Tom Moore. Thus, though confined physically to the drink that drowns kittens, I quaffed mentally not merely the best of our own home-made, but the rich, racy, sparkling growths of France, Italy, Germany and Spain; the champagne of Moliere, the Monte Pulciano of Boccaccio, the hock of Schiller, and the sherry of Cervantes. I passed bodily by the fluid that damps everything; I got intellectually elevated with Milton, a little merry with Swift, or rather jolly with Rabelais, whose Pantagruel, by the way, is equal to the best gruel with rum in it.

"So far can literature palliate or compensate for gastronomical privations. But there are other evils great and small in this world, which try the stomach less than the head, the heart and the temper; bowels that will not roll right; well-laid schemes that will "gang a-glee," and ill winds that blow with the pertinacity of the monsoon. Of these Providence has allotted me a full share. But still, paradoxical as it may sound, my burthen has been greatly lightened by a load of books. The manner of this will be best understood by a feline illustration. Everybody has heard of the two Kilkenny cats who devoured each other, but it is not generally known that they left behind them an orphan kitten; which, true to its breed, began to eat itself up till it was diverted from the operation by a mouse. Now the human mind, under vexation, is still like that kitten, for it is apt to prey upon itself unless drawn off by a new object, and none better for the purpose than a book. For example, one of Defoe's; for who, in reading his thrilling History of the Great Plague, would not be reconciled to a few little ones?"

Thomas Hood was a very interesting and happy writer for children—one of the most difficult of compositions. No author could interest children like the inimitable Hood. He writes thus to a friend of his:

"My Dear May.—How do you do, and how do you like the sea? Not much, perhaps, it's 'so big.' But shouldn't you like a nice little ocean that you could put in a pan? Yet the sea, although it looks rather ugly at first, is very useful, and if I were near it this dry summer I would carry it all home to water the garden with at Stratford, and it would be sure to drown all the wights and May-flies. I remember that when I saw the sea it used sometimes to be very fussy and fidgetty, and didn't always wash itself quite clean; but it was always fond of fun. Have the waves ever run after you yet, and turned your little two shoes into pumps full of water? If you want a joke, you might push Dannie into the sea, and then fish for him as they do for a jack. But don't go in yourself, and don't let the baby go in and swim away, although he is the shrimp of the family. Did you ever taste the sea-water? The fishes are so fond of it that they keep drinking it all day long. Dip your little finger in and then suck it to see how it tastes. A glass of it warm, with sugar and a grate of nutmeg, would quite astonish you. The water of the sea is so saline I wonder that people don't catch salt fish in it. I should think a good way would be to go out in a butter boat, with a little melted for sauce. Have you bathed yet in the sea, and were you afraid? I was the first time, and the time before that; and, dear me, how I kicked and screamed, or at least meant to scream; but the sea, ships and all, began to run into my mouth, and so I shut it up. I think I see you being dipped in the sea, screwing your eyes up, and putting your nose into your mouth as you would put a button into a button-hole for fear of getting another smell and taste. By the bye, did you ever dive your head under water with your legs up in the air like a duck, and try whether you could cry 'Quack?' Some animals can."

While Hood was the editor of a magazine he had a correspondent, Mr. Phillips, who fell from his horse while out riding one day. Hood laughed at him about it, as the following letter will show:

My Dear Phillips.—What the devil do you mean? Have you no concern for the nerves of editors, the nourishment of magazine readers? It may be horse-play to you, but death to us. What business had you in the saddle at all? Have I not said in private sedentary persons never have a good seat? Is it not notorious that authors, from Coleridge down to Pool, are bad riders? And you must go and prove it by being run away with; not by vanity, in a very writer-like way, but by the brute quadruped, never well pick-a-backed by seamen and the literati. Do you want a hole in your head as well as in your lungs? And are you not contented with the neck, crying 'lost, lost,' but you must break your own? Is your head no better than a pumpkin, that you must go pitching on it, and grazing the 'dome of thought and palace of the soul?' I think I see you getting up—not content with expectorating blood—spitting mud? And, plague take you, all through trotting on an earthly roadster, when you might have been soaring so celestially on Pegasus after his feed of 'husks and grain.' Do you really expect, though you die of riding, that you will get an equestrian statue of it at Trafalgar Square, Cockspur Street, or in front of the new Exchange? Not a bronze pony! Nor will you get a shilling a sheet the more from Hood's or Blackwood's; no, nor from any of the Sporting Magazines, for going at a gait without hounds or fox! And a father to, with a baby, a boy and a young lad to bring up. And a friend with such friends as a Blair, a Solomons and a Hood, and all the Pratts, to expose himself to be kicked out of such society by a hoof. Oh! Phillipus, you deserve a philippic, and here it is. Seriously, I am glad you escaped, and 'hope that you will not do so any more.' If you must run risks, do it on two legs, and at a walk. For such invalids a damp clothes-horse is danger enough. Or, if you must go pick-a-back, get acquainted with some sheriff that can lend you a quiet nag."

In his letters on copyright and copy-wrong, Hood seems to have concentrated all his powers of wit, sarcasm, comment and force of utterance, until the thoughts burn into our feelings like solar rays beneath a lens. He says:

"If I have dwelt on the death of state patronage, public employments, honors and endowments, (for literary men,) it was principally to correct a vulgar error not noticed by Sir Thomas Brown—namely, that poets and their kind are 'marigold in the sun's eye,' the world's favorite and pet children, whereas they are in reality its snubbed ones. It was to show that literature, neglected by the Government, and unprotected by the law, was placed in a false position, whereby its professors present such anomalous phenomena as high priests of knowledge without a surplus; enlarged minds in the King's Bench; school-magistrates obliged to be abroad; great scholars without a knife and fork and spoon; master minds at journey-work; moral magistrates greatly underpaid; immortals without a living; menders of the human heart breaking their own; mighty intellects begrudged their mite; great wits jumping into nothing good; ornaments to their country put on the shelf; constellations of genius under a cloud; eminent pens quite stumped up; great lights of the age with a thief in them; prophets to booksellers. My ink almost blushes from black to red whilst marking such associations of the Divine One with the earthly. But methinks 'tis the metal of one of their scales in which we are weighed and found wanting. Poverty is the badge of all our tribe, and its reproach."

In these days of fashionable extravagance, when the ladies of our country are thinking about giving up their silks and their diamonds that our poor soldiers may be comfortably provided for, it may be of interest to some to learn what Hood says about the matter.

"They (authors) do not dress fashionably; for if they could afford it they know better, in a race for immortal fame, than to be outsiders. Some, it has been alleged, have run through their estates, which might have been easily traversed at a walk, and one and all have neglected to save half-a-crown out of sixpence a day.

"The lives of literary men are proverbially barren of incident, and consequently the most trivial particulars, the most private affairs are unceremoniously worked up to furnish matter for their bold biographers. Accordingly, as soon as an author is defunct, his character is submitted to a sort of Egyptian post-mortem trial, or rather a moral inquest, with Paul Pry for the coroner, and a judge of assize, a commissioner of bankrupts, a Jew broker, a Methodist parson, a dramatic licenser, a dancing-master, a master of the ceremonies, a rat-catcher, a bone collector, a parish clerk, a schoolmaster, and a reviewer for a jury. It is the province of these personages to rummage, ransack, scrape together, rake up, ferret out, sniff, detect, analyze and appraise all the particulars of the birth, parentage and education, life, character and behavior, breeding, accomplishments, opinions and literary performances of the departed.

"Secret drawers are searched; private and confidential letters are published; manuscripts intended for the fire are set in type; tavern bills and washing bills are compared with their receipts; copies of writs re-copied; inventories taken of effects; wardrobes ticketed off by the tailor's accounts; by-gone toys of youth, billet-doux, snuff-boxes, canes exhibited; discarded hobby-horses are trotted out; perhaps even a dissecting surgeon is called to draw up a minute state of the corpse and its viscera. In short, nothing is spared that can make an item for the clerk to insert in his memoirs.

"Outrageous as it may seem, this is scarcely an exaggeration; for example, who will dare say that we do not know at this very hour more of Goldsmith's affairs than he ever did himself?"

TRUE COURAGE.

"NO, it is not all remarkable, my dear. A man of Alan's make is not easily content to stand idly by and watch others striving for fame without having a share in the race or in the spoils."

"Oh, do you think that his motive?"

"Not altogether, perhaps; he has fine traits, fine ability—Alan's well-fitted to succeed. Pity he married so early, great pity—his wife was not of the right stamp. Hand me the grapes, dear. Where's Gracie?"

"In the library with Alan; he came to borrow a book for his mother. I like that devotion of his; he thinks no woman in the world her equal."

"What all sons ought to believe faithfully."

"I wish Grace would keep some of her high-flown ideas a little in check. I am sure she is talking with all her might to Alan, and he has been excited enough ever since he came back. Have you noticed how moody and absorbed he is?"

"That is because his mind is not fully decided. Then, too, those three months unsettled his business arrangements."

"These grapes are very fine. Charles, do you think Alan has any idea of asking us for Gracie?"

There was a slight shrug, a half-anxious smile on the paternal visage as Mr. Redwood responded:

"How can I tell, my love? Stranger things have happened."

"Fancy Grace a stepmother! I should not like it at all."

"Ah, it would come home to us!" said Mr. Redwood, smiling. "No, I have no wish, either, to be an antiquated grand parent quite so suddenly. Besides, Gracie would grace a fortune which Alan could not give her."

"Oh, as for that, if they loved each other—"

"The woman will out," interrupted Mr. Redwood; "all for love, without a thought of the needful lucre."

"Yes; I have not improved since my youthful days," said the wife, demurely.

It was getting dusky in the luxurious parlor: "shadows from the fitful fire-light" were already dancing on the wall. With twilight comes that dreamy lingering over the past; joys and sorrows are seen through a mellow mist of indistinctness; and so sat Mr. Redwood and his wife, quite forgetful of the present, talking over old and happy days which the wife's light allusion had recalled; forgetful, too, of the two younger people who, not far off, were quite as pleasantly employed.

The golden autumnal sunset deepening to crimson was slanting in the library windows, which, open to the ground, gave glimpses of garden paths brownly matted with fallen leaves. The faint breath of asters, purple and pink, white and yellow, came in with the freshening air. Far off, the hills now darkening, at mid-day glowed like a bouquet.

At a door of the book-cases stood Grace, her slight, small stature looking slighter and smaller for the athlete beside her, whose brown face was intent upon a book as he listened to her rapid, forceful words. Her face was full of verve, life, activity; even her delicate fingers were busy, and the dark wool with its bright border was fast being fashioned into something wearable.

"Oh, Alan," she was saying, "it makes me impatient to hear people sighing over the times! I think this a grand age, a noble era, when Good and Evil have met, like knights of old to test the prowess of their followers. Who can doubt the final triumph? Good must win: this we all believe."

Her companion assented silently, not caring to check her flow of thought; and she went on, her whole face lighting, her proudly curved lips enunciating every word with a clearness which was musical, like the swift fall of nuts on a still day in the woods.

"If our ancestors could have been gifted with prescience, I really think they would have been glad to know that this day was coming; not for the bitter strife nor for the bloodshed, but for the grandeur of a people rising in their might to redeem their country from treachery and error. My ancestors, you know"—and the little pride of ancient did not mar the sweet smile which rose—"were of the best blood; and as I look at Rufus, I often think my brother a fit representative of a noble race. But had he shirked his duty at such a time, had he not been so nobly eager for the fray with so earnest a purpose. I could hardly have hidden my scorn."

Alan glanced up quickly as if stung; unconsciously Grace netted on briskly, her eyes now on her work. There was a little tinge of sarcasm in Alan's tone, as he replied—"You then would be like the one, Grace, who, when

> 'Home they brought her warrior dead,
> She nor swooned, nor uttered cry.'"

A shadow crept over Grace's brow, which, in animation, had kept true time to her words.

"I don't know—it is a glorious death," she said, very gently and slowly, Alan's face changing its expression as she spoke. "I should not regret that he had chosen it; but, Alan, you remember that at last—

> 'Like summer tempest came her tears.'"

"And even now I see a glistening drop. Dear Grace, forgive me—I was cruel; but—I don't know whether you meant it or not; yet your words seem to reflect on my actions."

The glistening drop was swept instantly away.

"I know you better, Alan. I am sure you told me that you wanted to go—that you would go."

"But—"

"There must be no but in the way, Alan. Don't you know that this is a recruiting station? I have induced a number of enlistments."

For all her playfulness her companion still looked serious; he began too to stride slowly up and down the room with the forgotten book in his hands. Grace looked admiringly at his strong, manly frame; of all her preux chevaliers Alan was her chosen one for dauntless courage and resolve. She longed to see him still more her hero.

"You told me, Alan, that it would be no very difficult work for you to raise a regiment; and you know with what élan men would fight under the command of one so nobly fitted to lead them."

The praise was so gently offered, with such persuasiveness, that Alan could not resist it. He stopped in his walk, and faced the winning demoiselle.

"Grace, do you really think all duties subservient to this of fighting for one's country?"

"Certainly, Alan," answered the enthusiast.

"Can you imagine nothing which demands a man's life and honor quite as much?"

"Not at this time."

Alan again walked the floor, speaking as he did so.

"I am so nearly of your mind, Grace, that I cannot conscientiously argue for the other side. Besides——— Oh, I must go! I believe, as you say, that I can have some little influence; and certainly I owe my share of toil and hardship and danger. I long for it; God knows it is not a craven spirit which has made me hesitate."

He was roused from his moody quietude; but Grace did not quail at the fire she had evoked. More than ever she admired him. Suddenly he turned and said: "My motherless children, Grace, who can I leave them with? My mother is too old to be burdened with the care of them, and if I die—"

Swiftly two hands grasped his in their firm but velvet touch, and an eager face looked up at him.

"Leave them with me, Alan."

"You, Grace, you?"

"Do you doubt my ability?"

"Are you willing to be a stepmother, Grace?"

"Oh, Alan!"—and the hands relaxed their hold, but did not fall, for now Alan had them fast and close—"I did not mean that."

"Of course not, Gracie; but that is what it amounts to. Do not struggle so; your fingers have a way of restlessness that is not good for them—they will be hurt. Now you must listen. You have told me my duty, let me tell you yours. I want some one to bid me go forth and win fame as well as fight bravely. I want some one to be thinking of me, and praying for me while I am gone. Yes, I am just so selfish; and I want that person to be one whom I love better than any one in this world or any other."

"Hush, Alan! you forget you ever had a wife."

"Indeed not, Grace; I remember that four years I was bound to one who loved me not so much as the poodle she petted in her arms—one who, though dead, I dare to say was not a true woman. Never let her name again come between us, Grace. Silence only can heal such painful memories. Grace, are you too proud to be a poor man's wife?" Alan asked, softly, as she stood with eyes cast down and wrists still turning uneasily.

"No, Alan, nor—a stepmother, if in this way I can aid the good cause," she answered, with a half smile.

"But, Grace, is your love to be the guerdon for only my soldier career?"

"I shall be so proud, Alan, if it can be."

Only half satisfied, he drew her nearer, nearer. Nor did she shrink away timidly. The spirit of old romance and days of chivalry shone in the eyes of her clear eyes. His kisses fell softly on her brow, "royal with the truth," and, as in a dream, they stood silently watching the darkening garden paths, not heeding the growing chilliness of the air, or the dead leaves which fluttered in at their feet.

"Now, mother mine, you know all. How does it please you?" said Alan, drawing his chair close to the one where sat in rather stately uprightness an old lady, who for nobility of feature matched the one beside her. But the older voice trembled, the older eyes were dimmer and looked farther back than forward.

"Alan, dear, you know that I love Grace, and that I long to see you happy with one so well fitted to render your home all that you wish; yet the compact does not please me."

"What compact, mother?"

"It is evident that Grace wishes you to go to the war."

"Certainly, she spurs me on to what I most desire."

"Have you told her how you are situated?"

A darkening shade gathered over Alan's face as he replied, somewhat impetuously, "Why should I? She thinks as I do, that nothing so much demands a man's life and honor as his country."

"Alan, 'they also serve who stand and wait.'"

The storm had been brooding all the afternoon; now it broke angrily; the words came like dashing, driving rain.

"Not those of brawny muscle, and each nerve strung for action—not men born to do and dare, to lead and fight and conquer. Mother, why have you so long combated me? I have no right to refuse this second call. Had the women of the Revolution your spirit where would we have been now? Did they not urge on their sons and husbands? Look! I am a soldier, every inch of me. Military science has been my passion for years. I have influence. I can go into the ranks with twice the power of ordinary men. My example has some weight, and the cause could not be nobler. Why do you persist in opposing me?"

"Because, Alan,"—and the fragile form grew more erect, the dim eye calmer, steadier than ever in its gaze upon her excited son—"because God's hand points to a different path for you. My son, listen patiently to me. Years ago, you spurned my advice, and rushed on recklessly to sorrow—rushed on to that which now is hindering you at every step. Listen. Alan, my son, God blessed you with many gifts, with health, strength and intellect. Life began for you very auspiciously; but you remember, dear, how rashly, from one imprudence to another, beginning with your loveless marriage, from one extravagance to another, you went blindly forward—not blindly either, but wilfully—until you were so involved that there was but one course for you to pursue, if ever your errors were to be redeemed. Nobly you paused, and determined to begin anew; unselfishly you bowed to your burden; and; my son, you have so far retrieved the past as to convince all that your honor is above reproach. But, Alan, all is not yet accomplished; your debts are yet heavy; it will take years of hard work for you to redeem your obligations; and the penalty though severe, is just. Wilful rashness and folly led you to assume them; wilful determination to do your duty must rid you of them. I know you will cry out at me, but, believe me, it is your duty to stay at home and work. The principle is just as imperative as the country's need, though less heroic in the world's view."

"And what if all men and all mothers should think as you?" asked Alan, whose head was bowed between his hands.

"Each must decide for himself, Alan. The time may come, the peril be so great that I should say even to you, Go! but it has not yet; men and treasure are pouring forth. Then, Alan, your children, God gave them to you. My life is not worth much; do they not need you to guide them, to support and educate them?"

There was no answer, only a smothered groan.

The mother's heart overflowed, tears streamed down her aged cheeks as she rose and drew Alan's head down on her shoulder.

"Alan, my boy, do not grieve; God's way is the best always. I honor your patriotism. I share it, darling! You have forgotten that I sent your brother, who even now may be suffering or dead."

"Mother, I am a brute! I don't ask you to forgive me. I acknowledge that ambition had blinded me; my motive was not the purest patriotism."

"Hush, Alan! you do yourself injustice. I know your brave, proud spirit; but, darling, you see which way lies your path, do you not? Even to-day a letter from your uncle speaks of a position soon at your command, in which, with your youth and energy, you may sooner than you think be untrammelled."

There was utter silence. The storm had quieted. Alan's face was stern and pale; but as he rose to leave the room he bent for a moment over the chair which his mother had again resumed. The look and gentle caress which accompanied it assured the victory.

Grace was skimming down stairs to the blithe tripping notes of "Malbrook s'en va-t-en guerre" as Alan stalked in the hall the following morning; but she stopped suddenly with a vivid blush as she met his dark eyes and quiet salutation. She had involuntarily expected a little more ardor from her lover; but though they found the library unoccupied, Alan still maintained his cool gravity, not so much as offering to kiss her dainty little hand, where gleamed his own seal ring, with its crest and motto of "Au vrai courage, rien impossible." Alan broke silence, however, at once.

"Grace, I have come to release you from yesterday's promise, to ask your pardon for my rashness."

He seemed to think a quick plunge better than any slower procedure. Grace looked steadily and silently up at him, unprepared and incredulous, waiting for a fuller meaning of his words. His task was not easy; the very presence of the little Joan d'Arc, as he had often called her, made it hard for him to quell the aim which for months had been tightening its power.

"Reasons which have restrained me this long fled while in your persuasive presence yesterday, Grace, and I told you that which I ought not to have done—a share of the perils and glories of our time is not for me, nor the guerdon which you promised; since I cannot fight I cannot claim the reward."

Slowly, rather bitterly he spoke. Slowly, rather sadly she replied:

"'Au vrai courage, rien impossible,'" slipping off the ring as she quoted its motto. The bauble fell with a tinkle on the hearth. Alan stooped to pick it up, his eyes flashing, the veins in his temples swelling. Did she mean to taunt him; was it not enough that he was enduring the sacrifice of his great desire without this added pain?

He was hurt, angry and proud. Swiftly reviewing the past, as his mother had done, in a few words to Grace he explained himself, she listening with downcast eyes. Hurriedly he went on, not defending himself, not arguing his case, merely telling her what he thought she had the right to know. Then he rose, and very gracefully, with manly earnestness and feeling, thanked Grace for her willingness to share his duties, relinquishing at the same time her cherished hope which for a few short hours had made him a happy man.

It was a dark, lowering day, and the wind was rising. The library seemed to grow darker the air chillier. Grace shivered a little. In her eyes was an absent, dreary, disappointed expression. She was looking down still, and her hands were clasped listlessly before her. Again she murmured "Au vrai courage, rien impossible." Again Alan's eyes flashed, but his voice was calm and low. Though a conquerer, he was wounded, but nothing now could make him flinch from his determination.

"What is vrai courage, Grace?"

She looked up at him. "I was thinking, Alan."

Her voice was so sweet and sad that the thought of her taunting him seemed an ignoble suspicion. Eager words were rising to his lips, but he paused as he saw the absent, pained expression fading from her eyes and a clearer light dawning under the fringed lids. She was so beautiful, and he so loved her, that for one moment he longed to say, "Grace, honor, duty, life itself is at your disposal. Command what you will, I obey;" but the man in him was too strong, too vital for that.

"No," he thought, "I can give her up too. I have done it—the struggle is over; cost what it may, duty shall win."

Grace stood still with clasped hands, but the little fingers were no longer listless; her proud little head was poised dauntlessly as she spoke:

"Yes, Alan, I was thinking over that motto; for once the man who bears it on his shield proves it in his life."

Alan started. Had he heard aright? Was he in his sane, sober senses?

Still, with the same verve in face and speech as on the previous day, she went on:

"Courage to deny yourself fame and honor, courage to choose the humbler duty, and courage to give up what seemed to be dear to you"—blushing exquisitely and modestly as she spoke so of herself—"that is vrai courage. I honor you, Alan, for possessing it as much as I do the soldier who bleeds for our country."

Alan's voice for a moment could not find steady utterance; his stern resolve and self-denial, with the forlorn prospect of a loveless life before him, had so fixed themselves in his mind that he looked at Grace mentally as one does actually at strong sunshine after being in the dark; but her earnest admiration and glance of warm regard brought him quickly to her side.

"What, Grace, is it true? Can you, then, love me, though not your warrior hero?"

For all answer she let his arms encircle her and buried her face in his bosom.

MATHEWS' attendant in his last illness intended to give the patient some medicine, but, a few moments after, it was discovered that the medicine was nothing but ink, which had been taken from the vial by mistake, and his friend exclaimed: "Good Heavens! Mathews, I have given you ink!" "Never—never mind, my boy—never mind," said Mathews, faintly; "I'll swallow a bit of blotting paper." This was the last joke Mathews ever made.

MY DIVINITY.

SOME deity see in stars, some in the moon,
Some azure skies adore, or rising sun;
But I, more infidel than these—or wise—
Worship alone thy Orient eyes.

Naught see I more divine: to wood, and stone,
And graven image I forego to kneel;
The redness of thy lips waylaying prayer,
I can but falter, "Thou art fair!"

The silken tresses of thy hair enfold,
Like raven wings, the whiteness of thy breast;
Pearl tint and jet deliciously combine,
To decorate my living shrine.

And when thy voice melodiously tunes
Itself to speech, and I the music hear,
My heart so thrills with rapture that I swoon,
Losing the dulcet strain too soon.

Statues of marble, god and goddess wrought,
Half seen, half hid, through art's seductive doors,
Invite approaches with immortal charms—
I fly repellent to thy arms.

Diviner things may be, more high, more pure—
The glory of their presence is not mine;
Thou art of Deity all that form can take,
And I—am Pagan for thy sake.

Condemn me not for sacrilege, because
The fairest thing I see I deem divine;
Faith, like a rising feather backward blown,
Is reconciled to thee alone.

Witless of art, therefore unborn to shame,
I do not blush to stand, clean-limbed and strong,
Before thy presence, deeming all things meet
That God has called complete.

Like savage lord of a barbaric isle,
Ignorant and careless of occult design,
Nature is to my sense an open sea
Whose currents culminate in thee.

Richer, sweeter, nearer and dearer are
Phrases I know not of, nor wish to learn;
Clasping thy alabaster waist, I swing
The world round, daring everything!

Strewn upon western sunbeams' purple tints,
Bridals, and vows, and rings, like planet stars,
Sparkle along the Night's dream-born abyss,
Melting my orison into a kiss.

W. A. KENDALL.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XXIII.

I KNOW not how long I remained in this state. Lost in strange dreams, I was suddenly aroused by a burning sensation on my neck; I opened my eyes, it was almost dark, and I saw that I was alone with M. de Maufert. He held in his hand Diana's locket.

"Where did you get this trinket?" said he with a quivering voice.

Scarcely recovered from my stupor, I hardly understood him, and only murmured an answer.

"Oh," said he, "this is no time for falsifications. Answer me, if you are not a coward! This is a pledge, is it not? A pledge of that sublime love which saved you from madness? She gave it you—she is doubtless your mistress."

At this insult I sprang up, and we were face to face, but I had enough command over myself to restrain my wrath.

"I pity you," said I to him; "your insults cannot reach her!"

He struck at me, but I did not move, and, looking him full in the face, "Well, kill me," said I, calmly; "you will then inherit all."

His contracted countenance became livid; an oath fell from his lips like the howl of a wild beast; but suddenly he walked towards the window, opened it, and seemed to inhale the cool night air, as if he were suffocated by his anger.

I waited, immobile and silent. When my guardian turned towards me every trace of emotion had left his face.

"We will converse now," said he, with terrible calmness.

I did not speak.

"This locket, sir," continued he, "belongs to my wife. I suppose I may be permitted to ask by what strange chance I found it here around your neck."

"She lost it, sir; I found it and I kept it."

"That is very sentimental," said he, ironically; "but however ethereal this love may be, my honor suffers—"

"Your honor!" exclaimed I.

"You adore her; she has told you that she loves you, and I am jealous."

A terrible light broke on my mind. I remembered all.

"Do you want witnesses to your words? Oh, your enthusiasm was beautiful, and the most unsuspecting husband could not be deluded."

I listened, completely terrified; I thought of the unhappiness hanging over Diana's head.

"Ah, you are silent!" continued M. de Maufert.

There came to me an inspiration from heaven. "What are you telling me, sir?" said I, with a forced laugh. "Don't you know that I am mad, and that I imagine all sorts of things in my delirium? Oh, what a charming story! My godmother in love with me, and confessing it."

And I laughed and laughed; and the torture nearly killed me.

"So you lied?"

"Stop there!" said I, feigning rage. "That word is not for a gentleman. I will have satisfaction for that before the Court. And when I have killed you, my godmother will marry the king, and I will marry the queen whom I have loved ever since the day she gave me her golden veil. You will find the story of our loves told in the book of Wolfgang von Hartzfeld of Thuringia, two volumes of which are in my library. There is the truth."

While this horrible comedy was going on, my blood was freezing. I thought of Diana, betrayed and denounced by me, abandoned without defense to the cruelties of this implacable master. My guardian watched me closely and a smile curled his lips.

"So you confess that you are mad?" said he to me.

"Make a distinction; I am mad to you and those like you; but it is all the same to me; she, whom I love, can appreciate my wisdom."

At this moment Granger entered the room with Dr. Delatre. I could not help blushing. The Count uttered an exclamation of joy.

"Come now, my dear Granger, here is your client who pleads madness himself, and I believe upon my soul, that he will demand the privilege of signing this proces-verbal which has given you so much trouble."

I saw that I was condemned; I felt an indescribable sinking feeling, but more than ever was it necessary to save Diana.

"I am ready to sign," said I, with animation, "if you in exchange will give your consent to my marriage with the queen?"

The lawyer started back in astonishment.

"Ah, you do not know about it yet?" continued my guardian. My ward is the lover of a queen of Thuringia, who gave him her golden veil—"

"Do not speak so loud; she is there," said I, pointing to the bed; "she sleeps."

"Well, well, that is understood; you shall marry her, corbleu! Bring in the proces-verbal, Granger."

"Take care, Count," said my old friend, gravely, "there is foul play here."

"Tudieu! you are zealous, mon cher," replied M. de Maufert, dryly. Arrange it between you and him and the faculty. I wash my hands of it."

The doctor examined me attentively; he requested to be left alone with me. I penetrated his object; I became alarmed. I was frightened.

"No, no," I exclaimed, "you have decided. Go away."

"Gentlemen, be careful," said my guardian; "we might awaken the queen; let us retire. We have, besides, a final arrangement to make."

Granger insisted; I became enraged. And insulted him grossly; my guardian laughed. At last, they left the room.

Left alone, I no longer thought of my own disaster, but of Diana, of her despair, and desolate prospects. If my guardian should no longer believe in my madness, now that his suspicions were roused? if he should exercise some dreadful revenge? And it was I who had caused it all. I searched for some way to succor her: there was none. She was alone, without family, without any defender, except myself: on all sides I touched against the impossible. Crime alone was left to me. He dead, she was saved.

It was almost night. Immobile and broken down by the weight of my sorrows, I tried to convince myself that my feigned madness had removed the suspicions of the Count, when a hand was placed on my shoulder. At the touch of the hand I knew it was he. I turned around, as haggard as if surprised in the accomplishment of the bloody work.

"Oh, a truce to your madness!" said he, coldly. "We are alone, and I have no longer an excuse to listen to your romantic falsehoods. Wait for another attack; you will act the madman better. Now we have another affair to settle about my wife, whom it does not please me to see you love."

"I am at your orders, sir," replied I, comprehending that he wished for satisfaction.

"Parbleu! I count on that. We will leave for Germany to-morrow morning. It is useless to return to the chatean; your friend Granger will entertain you; be ready at 8 o'clock."

"Very well, sir. I will be ready."

He bowed to me, and went out.

I was overcome by my great joy; his provocation saved me from myself: he offered himself to my blows. I would have him at the end of my sword, face to face, in open day, and I could kill him without remorse. I threw myself on my knees and thanked God for His goodness.

It was necessary to explain every thing to Diana. My guardian was doubtless already on the road to Maufert, but with Ralph, and by taking the short-cuts, it would be very easy to gain half an hour on the Count who was in a carriage, and so would be obliged to make a long detour to cross the bridge over the Semoy river, while I could ford it. I ran to the stable; my horse was still there. I saddled him in five minutes, regardless of Granger's anxiety, which increased rapidly at my agitation.

"My friend," exclaimed I, "observe me well; you see that more than ever I have my senses; but after the imprudent words that escaped me while laboring under great mental excitement, he will perhaps kill her—"

"Ah, my child!" said he "may God preserve you!"

I dashed through the streets at a gallop, endangering the lives of the foot passengers. At last I reached the high-road, and, giving rein to Ralph, abandoned myself to his instincts. Through the darkness from time to time lights gleamed, and some farm wagons barred my road. My horse ran against a man; he fell. I jumped over the body; I heard the cries of the wagoners, but did not stop. My lugubrious presentiments grew upon me. A minute's delay and Diana was lost. I must make her decide to fly, to hide herself, until my sword should deliver her from her tyrant. Without doubt M. de Maufert had already prepared some horrible conspiracy in which to entangle her and prolong her misery.

I passed Thilay. After finding the Semoy, it was but a quarter of an hour's ride to Maufert. Already through the darkness I thought I saw the bank, when I suddenly checked my horse; the river, swollen by the late rains, had overflowed its banks. For a moment I was overcome by an indescribable despair. To retrace my steps, and regain the high-road was, to compromise the last chance of success. At the risk of my life, I must arrive in time. I recommended my soul to God, and pushed forward to the gulf, resolved to swim my horse across. Ralph resisted, trembling with fright. I thrust my spurs deep in his sides. After the first few steps, he lost his footing and was swept down by the current. I encouraged him with my voice; in the midst of the tumult, one could almost believe that he comprehended my terrors. I upheld with a firm hand his nostrils out of the current but the bubbling up of the raging waters blinded him; sometimes I saw him falter, and thus we went shipwrecked into the darkness. For six minutes that seemed a century, we fought against a thousand deaths. At last I saw rising in front of me, the trees on the other bank; but Ralph was worn out, the death rattle was in his throat. Suddenly his head sank under the water; no longer any hope. I uttered a cry of distress; I sprang into the water to help sustain him; he breathed, but, incommoded by my clothes, I feared that I would be powerless to lead him in this state to the shore, when, as by a miracle, my feet touched the ground. We were out of danger.

Once at the top of the bank I let my poor Ralph rest; his knees shook under him, and he was incapable of carrying me to Maufert. To abandon him was to leave him to certain death. I dragged him by the bridle for some hundred yards; little by little his noble and generous ardor revived: I jumped in the saddle and rode on.

Luckily I had the key of the park gate, which saved me a long detour. I went quickly to the stable, and confided Ralph to one of my servants. Through the black night, I hastened towards the chateau; no light in the salon, no light from the windows of Diana's room, no sound but the whistling of the wind, which rolled great opaque clouds across the sky and wailed through the foliage. I entered the vestibule; it was deserted. I called—no one answered me. With a sinking heart, I ran to the servant's hall; a few servants were still there. At seeing me they could not hide a movement of fear. Catherine, Diana's maid, was in their midst; she came towards me—

"My godmother?" said I to her.

"She is gone, sir," replied she, astonished.

"Gone? When?—where has she gone?"

"Why, she has gone to meet you, Baron. Have you not seen her?"

"She has gone to meet me?"

"Yes, she left immediately after receiving a letter from the Count, which said that an accident had befallen you."

I divined a snare.

"Catherine, explain everything to me. You love your mistress—I fear some misfortune—"

"That is all I know, sir," replied she, much affected. "About 5 o'clock, Martin returned from Montherme with a note for the Countess, and one for M. Placide, who had orders to accompany her. The Countess found the coupé harnessed by M. Placide, who would not have the coachman, but mounted the box himself, and drove off. When you came we were very uneasy—"

"Placide said nothing?"

"Nothing; only Martin hinted that they would not return to night; perhaps not to-morrow—"

Leaving Maufert at 5 o'clock, Diana would be at Montherme at 7—and I did not leave Granger's house till after 9. Everything showed that she had already fallen in the net spread by the Count. The penetrating perfidy of M. de Maufert had foreseen all. In the paroxysm of my sorrow I had but one idea. Catherine, as pale as I, questioned me through her tears.

"Where is Bastien?" said I to her.

"He ought to be at home," murmured she, blushing.

"My good Catherine, run this instant and find him, and tell him to come here, while I change my clothes, and saddle the horses."

"But, sir, if I am seen by any of the villagers at his door at this time of night?"

"I swear to you that it is to save your mistress. Every minute's delay exposes her life—"

"Oh, sir, I fly!"

She ran off. I went quickly up stairs; I was almost frozen, and the perspiration rolled in great drops off my brow. Fritz was asleep; I did not arouse him. In an instant I had on a dry suit of clothes. I filled my pockets with all the gold I possessed; I chose pistols at random from my collection, and returned to the stable. My poor Ralph lay dying in his stall; at my caresses he raised his drooping head and fell back dead. I awoke one of the hostlers and ordered him to bring my tilbury out of the coach-house. Then I took out my fastest horse; I commenced to put the harness on him, when I saw that the hostler had not stirred. I thought that he had gone to sleep again, and I went to shake him up. I saw his eyes were wide open.

"Did you not hear me?" said I to him. "Oh, yes, sir," replied he: "but it is not worth while to take the trouble to bring out all those things, as it is forbidden for you to have a horse."

"Impudent rascal!" I exclaimed; "obey me or—"

"It is impossible, sir; the Count would dismiss me—"

I was not in the humor to talk; I took up a heavy riding whip.

"Now, get up!" said I, my lips quivering.

He did not dare resist, and dressed himself, calling to another sleeping at the other end of the stable: "O, Peter! don't you hear?"

"Yes," replied the other, "I am coming."

I finished harnessing the horse, but at the moment that I was buckling the last strap the two grooms placed themselves in front of me, each with a pitchfork in his hand.

"Baron," said the one I had threatened insolently, "we cannot let our horses go out."

"This one is mine," replied I, and I will take it."

"I beg of you, sir, do not place us in a false position," said Peter; "this is not reasonable, since we have our orders, and are two against you."

"Well! and we are two, also!" said a voice behind them.

I recognized Baston, who finding the door open, entered at the sound of an altercation.

"Here, now, down with the pitchforks!" continued the smuggler, whose vigor and resolute character were well known in the country.

I showed my pistol at the same time. At this sight the men drew back.

"You will make us lose our places, Bastien," said one of them.

"That is a misfortune, and I am sorry for it; but it seems that it must be so. M. André's business before all!"

He took a lantern and led the horse by the bridle. "It is I who took the animal," added he; "if the Count gets mad send him to me. And now, friends, keep quiet, or let him who draws attention to us beware."

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

BALFE'S Diadeste, or the Veiled Lady, was produced for the first time in California, at the Academy, on Monday night. The music without being strongly marked is pretty and pleasing, and its theme, "Diadeste, charming game," which recurs continually through the opera, is a very charming duet. The heroine, "Celina," (Miss Richings,) is the wife of the "Marquis Maufredi" (Mr. Hill,) who, through jealousy, causes her to wear a veil when she goes abroad—as though such a flimsy precaution could possibly avail a jealous husband. At mass one morning Celina is seen by one "Count Steno," (Mr. Seguin) a very proper sort of a man, but betrothed to a lady, the "Countess Arnalfi," (Miss Martin.) He has never seen the Countess; but in a country where all women are supposed to be pretty, that doesn't matter much. Steno falls in love with Celina, veil and all, without seeing her face. It so happens that Celina and Steno's betrothed are boson. friends, and they plot a surprise and punishment for both the indifferent lover and the jealous husband. Celina invcigles the Marquis into a little game called "Diadeste," something like the modern "philopeua," and in the course of this game goes a sort of blind—shall we say a Venetian blind—on the husband who veiled her. It is promised to Count Steno that if his discretion equal his valor he shall meet the veiled lady. And he is permitted to meet a veiled lady, but it is the Countess Arnalfi, not Celina. Count Steno gets down on his knees and makes a fool of himself, as most spoony men do. The Marquis happens along, and the Count is stowed away in a closet as though he were a china ornament; the Marquis smells a rat and "suspicions" a man about the premises: he storms and tears his wig and demands the key of the closet. After teasing him a little while by a pretended hesitation Celina gives it him, and in giving it philopenes him, or wins the "Diadeste." The Marquis then begins to think he has been foolish, and is willing to compromise by paying the forfeit, (500 ducats,) abandoning his former belief about there being a man behind the arras. He is somewhat puzzled when his wife produces one from the closet. It is now time for the Countess Arnalfi to have a voice in the discussion, and she comes in, repeating to Count Steno some of the nonsense he had uttered in their interview. An explanation and recognition follows, everybody is satisfied, all join in singing "Diadeste, charming game," and the opera ends. Mr. Peakes, as the black servant "Zambo," had an inconsiderable role, and Miss Kempton's part of "Ursula" was nearly as unimportant, the contralto having little to do except to look pretty; the costumes and properties were good, and the acting excellent. On the other evenings of the week the Academy has given us The Postillon du Lonjumeau, The Daughter of the Regiment, Linda and Norma; in Linda, on Weduesday evening, Miss Richings was in most excellent voice, and delighted her audience even beyond her usual power of pleasing. The Doctor of Alcantara is on the programme for to-night. Auber's opera of Fra Diavalo is announced for Tuesday evening. Maritana, Don Pasquale, and Crown Diamonds are in lively preparation, and will soon be produced. A complimentary benefit to Mr. Peter Richings comes off at the Academy on Monday evening. Let it be a benefit; both as manager and actor, Mr. Richings deserves a hearty recognition from the public.

Jeanie Deans was played at Maguire's Opera House on Friday and Saturday evenings last to pleased and attentive audiences, the matinée on Saturday afternoon bringing out the usual galaxy of beauty and fashion on the back seats. On Monday evening, The Man with the Iron Mask was presented, a play founded on the supposition that Louis the XIV. had a brother whom he did not treat like a man, and that the famous prisoner known only to history as "the Man with the Iron Mask" was that brother. In this play Mr. Mayo, as the masked man, had an opportunity of displaying some very good acting. We have before spoken of this young actor; he has genius, and of an excellent order. Gleams of it look out occasionally even from his worst personations, and if he chooses to devote himself to his profession with that enthusiasm which has marked the career of all who have risen, he will yet be heard of. If asked to suggest a hint for the furtherance of his future, we should reply: Travel and study. These conjointly would work wonders for him, and the crudities at present noticeable in some of his best efforts would no longer remain to be complained of. Mr. Mayo is not mechanical, and the individualities of the man are not thrust forward into everything he undertakes. This is praise which unfortunately can be said of few actors in the stock companies of this coast. His great and most glaring fault at present is an attempt to put too many tears into his voice, consequently watering some of the more pathetic passages beyond endurance. This was noticeable in the play we are speaking of, during his interviews with Marie while masked and in prison. A less lively and wide-awake woman than Mrs. Perry would have gone to sleep while he was drawling out her name, and we are not sure that she didn't wink like a sleepy periwinkle once in a while and request him sotto voce to go on with his dying. As D'Aubigne, Wheatleigh was, of course, good, and the part of the pitiless jailor was excellently rendered by Mr. Thorne. Mrs. Perry's "Marie" was very well done—and here we have another artiste that we feel like praising and lecturing in the same breath. She is full of bounding life, and her sparkling spirits enable her to carry all her parts through with an animation that seldom flags, while her conception of characters is generally correct, neither too faintly lined nor yet erring in the other excess of floridity—and if she would only be careful, take her mind a little away from what preachers call "the vanities of life," and devote it to the realities of the stage, she would very soon improve her position in the profession.

On Wednesday and Thursday evenings, Conway's Irish drama of Our Irish Cousin was performed, Mr. O'Neil taking the character analagous to "Asa Trenchard," in the play or extravaganza of which this Irish Cousin seems an adaptation. We consider Mr. O'Neil one of the best stage Irishmen that at present brandishes a shillelah or attempts to hold the mirror up to nature as revealed at a Donnybrook Fair. He has real humor, and his Irishman is by far more quiet and natural than the extravagant personations of Barney Williams and others who are popularly accepted as perfect shadows of the shamrock. The play was well put upon the stage and it was well played throughout, affording a great deal of fun in its various phases, and as good a provocation for laughter as could be desired; but it did not draw encouraging houses. The fact of the matter is, Mazeppa tapped Maguire's ledge, and now he is going down for the "lower tunnel" himself, advertising the above Stable if not classic piece for this evening, Mrs. Perry as the Tartar Boy. When we spoke of this lady's capability of rising in her profession, we did not think that she intended to mount in this manner from a horse's back, seeking hippotheatronic rather than histrionic honors. This is not the moral column, however—all the heavy business of ethics being done by common agreement in another part of the paper. As a question of art, however, we claim a right to say something about this hippomania. Everybody knows that Mazeppa itself is incomparable bosh, resembling the poem of that name, claimed as its sire, about as much as a horse railroad resembles a chariot of fire. If founded on any of Byron's poems, it is probably built upon Don Juan. So far as the play itself is concerned, no one would go out to sit it through were it not for the expectation that they would see something not generally shown in public. We do not know that impurity of motive guides the multitude, for a calf with two tails and two heads would probably draw quite as a large a crowd as a half-naked woman. It is the novelty of the thing that forms the attraction—we mean the novelty of seeing the exhibition in public, for the probabilities are that the sight is not much of a novelty to the greater part of the multitude. Were it advertised that Gov. Low would stand on his head or Gen. McDowell dance the tight rope on any given night at the Opera House, quite as large a crowd would turn out to see the performance as ever went to see the Menken attitudinize. Professionally speaking, we have an idea that Mrs. Perry will play the part capitally; she makes up well in boys' roles, and, taking her performance in ballet as an indication, one would say she is a practiced gymnast. Moreover, she fences like a corporal. Notwithstanding, however, this conviction that she will play the part well, we wish that this clever actress had avoided the horse-walks of the profession. A correspondent sends us the following lines, suggested by the Mazeppa mania:

THE NEW LONGING.

Oh! I could not tell the reason
Of her sobbing and her tears.
What dark shade has crossed her sunshine?
What has roused her maiden fears?

Fair-haired, calm-eyed, sweet and tender,
Warm beneath thy bosom's snow,
Maid of eighteen, kind and gentle,
What has caused those tears to flow?

And this little, little sister,
School-girl ripening into prime,
Weeping, and her loving cousin
Sobbing out the same sad chime;

All the little female children,
All the maidens of the city,
Bore the same lugubrious aspect
And appeals to public pity

And I could not for long hours,
Tell what doom had fallen down,
From the judgment seat of fortune
Upon all the maids in town,

Till I heard these tender maidens
Sing in unison their need—
Oh, I want to be Mazeppa
On the untamed Tartar steed!"

Hush! my children, tender maidens,
Dry, my lisping babes, your eyes,
You shall each one like Mazeppa
Ride the "untamed" to the skies.

And I staid their sobs with mince-pie,
Tucked them, sleeping, out of sight,
And they each rode Tartar ponies—
Horrid night-mares all the night.

Still I cannot calm their passion,
Not with pies, or gold, or heads.
Tender maids would be Mazeppas
With their untamed Tartar steeds!

Mr. Wheatleigh concluded his engagement at the Opera House last evening with a benefit, the entertainment being The Victims, concluding with the Irish comedietta of The Limerick Boy. We much regret the retirement of this gentleman, for it was always a pleasure to witness his acting. We trust his absence will be but temporary.

Wilson's Hippotheatron, after a successful tour through the interior, has finally got back to its starting place, and will open on the old ground some time during the coming week. Zoyara is represented as none the worse for her (we beg pardon, is it his?) country travels, and the trained pony is in high feather. The public will likewise be glad to know that neither Ross nor Carlo have broken a neck or dislocated so much as a toe-joint in the performance of acrobatic feats, while Durand and Painter are as gymnastic as ever, if not more so. The Comic Department has not suffered, and the entertainment will be opened in its old style of elegance and expense. Mr. Wilson will find unexpected rivals in the shows now offered at the other hippotheatres, but having the most horses he will probably be enabled to carry off the honors.

"Jeems Pipes of Pipesville" arrived by the America on Thursday, and proposes to give his lecture, called Drifting About, in this city and through the State. Mr. Massett is an old Californian, and this fact alone should secure him good audiences. In addition to this recommendation to favor, however, he brings excellent endorsements of his entertainment from leading journals of the East. We apprehend that Mr. Massett will have no occasion to regret that he has drifted this way, though he has struck a time in which his success would be greater could he reply affirmatively to the question: Can you ride? An advertisement of his first lecture will be found in another column.

We are indebted to George B. Merrill for a copy of Hospital Transports, being a memoir of the embarkation of the sick and wounded from the Virginia Peninsula in the summer of '62. In this book we have an example of what the Sanitary Commission, the noblest charity ever formed upon earth, has done for our suffering soldiers.

Queen Elizabeth's Last Lover.—The ill-favored Anjou pleased Elizabeth more than he did the people. The pulpit echoed with objections made to unnatural alliances, and pamphlets were published of so offensive a nature on this subject that the stationers who put them forth got their hands chopped off for their impertinence. And yet the people, pulpit and pamphlets had their influence notwithstanding. Anjou came a second time, and tarried several months here, till his patience was worn out or his power of simulation was at end. They dallied and pouted and caressed, and exchanged tokens and caused much jealousy, and seemed to be mutually smitten, and finally parted forever. The Queen accompanied Anjou, stage by stage, to Canterbury; she returned to write sonnets descriptive of her imaginary miseries. And all for a hideous fellow whom his own sister loathed, and to whom his most intimate companion, Bussy d'Amboise, once said: "If I were Anjou and you were Bussy, I wouldn't have you for a lacquey."—Court and Society from Elizabeth to Anne.

THE NOTTING HILL MYSTERY.

SECTION VI.

1.—Memorandum by Mr. Henderson.

WE have now arrived at a point in this extraordinary case at which I must again direct your attention to the will of the late Mr. Bolton. By this will £25,000 was, as we have seen, bequeathed to Miss Bolton (afterwards Mrs. Anderton,) with a life interest, after her death, to her husband. At his decease, and failing children by his marriage with Miss Bolton, the money passed to the second sister, whom, as I have before said, we may, I think, be justified in identifying with the late Mme. R. It seems, at all events, clear, both from the circumstances attending the marriage of the Baron, and from the observations made by him at Bognor to Dr. Marsden relative to the pecuniary loss he would have sustained by the death of his wife, that the Baron himself believed and was prepared to maintain this relationship, and that the various policies of assurance effected on the life of Mme. R. to the gross amount of £25,000, the exact sum in question, were intended to cover any risk of her death before that of her sister. This is all that we need at present require. What import should be attached to the degree of mystery with which the whole affair both of the marriage and of the assurance seems to have been so carefully surrounded, will, of course, be matter for consideration when reviewing the whole circumstances of the case. It is enough for our present purpose that the Baron clearly looked upon his wife as the sister of Mrs. Anderton, and calculated upon participation, through her, in the legacy of Mr. Bolton. The lives of Mr. and Mrs. Anderton thus alone intervened between this legacy and the Baron's family, and we have thus established, on his part, a direct interest in their decease.

On the death of Mrs. Anderton, under the circumstances detailed in an earlier portion of the case, the life of her husband only now stood in the way of Baron R.'s succession, and it is important to bear this in mind in considering, as we are about to do, the various circumstances attendant on the death of that gentleman.

The chain of evidence on which hangs, as I have so often said, the sole hypothesis by which I can account for the mysterious occurrences that form the subject of our inquiry, is not only of a purely circumstantial character, but also of a nature at once so delicate and so complicated that the failure of a single link would render the remainder worthless. Unless the case can be made to stand out clearly, step by step, in all its details, from the commencement to the end, its isolated portions become at once a mere chaos of coincidences, singular indeed in many respects, but not necessarily involving any considerable element of suspicion. It is for this reason that I have, as before stated, endeavored to lay before you in a distinct and separate form each particular portion of the subject. Hitherto our attention has been entirely occupied with the death of Mrs. Anderton, and with various attendant circumstances, the bearing of which upon that occurrence will be more clearly shown hereafter. We have now to consider the very singular circumstances attending the lapse of the second life—that of Mr. Anderton—intervening, as we have seen, between Mr. Bolton's legacy and Mme. R.

For the purpose of this inquiry, I propose adducing pretty much the same evidence as that given at the inquests held on the bodies of Mrs. and Mr. Anderton. The final result of the former of these inquests was, as you are aware, a verdict of "Died from natural causes," though the case was at first adjourned for a fortnight in order to admit of a more searching and satisfactory examination of the body, during which time Mr. Anderton remained in custody in his own house. In the latter case the jury, after some hesitation, returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity, brought on by extreme distress of mind at the death of his wife, and suspicions respecting it which subsequently proved to have been unfounded." Our present concern, however, being with the conduct of the Baron rather than with that of Mr. Anderton, I have omitted portions not directly bearing upon his part in the matter, and have endeavored to procure such additions to the evidence of Dr. Dodsworth and others as might serve to further elucidate the subject of our inquiry.

I now, therefore, lay before you this portion of the case, with especial reference to its bearing upon the proceedings of Baron R.

2. Dr. Dodsworth's Statement.

I was in attendance on the late Mrs. Anderton during the illness which terminated fatally on the 12th of October, 1856. I was first sent for by Mr. Anderton, on the night of the 5th of April in that year. [Compare Sec. III., 3, etc.] I found her suffering apparently from a slight attack of English cholera, but was unable to ascertain any cause to which it might be attributed. There was nothing to lead to any suspicion of poisoning, indeed this seemed to be rendered almost impossible by the length of time that had elapsed since the last time of taking food and that at which the attack commenced. This was at least three or four hours; whereas, had the symptoms arisen from the action of any poisonous substance, they would have shown themselves much earlier. This is only my impression from after consideration. No idea of poison occurred to me at the time, nor should I now entertain any were I called in to a similar case. I prescribed the usual remedies for the complaint under which I supposed Mrs. Anderton to be suffering. They appeared to have their effect, though not so rapidly as I should have expected. The symptoms appeared rather to wear themselves out. I visited her several times, as the debility which ensued seemed greater than, under ordinary circumstances, should have followed on such an attack. About a fortnight later she had a fresh seizure, of a very similar kind. This time, however, the symptoms were aggravated, and accompanied by others of a more alarming character. Of these the most conspicuous were nausea, vomiting, violent perspiration, and increasing tendency to diarrhœa. The patient also complained of great sinking of the heart, and of a terrible lowness of spirits, almost amounting to a conviction that death was at hand. In the course of another fortnight or three weeks there was a fresh recurrence of the symptoms. The tongue, which in the former attacks had been clammy and dry, was now covered thickly with dirty mucus, and there was a greatly increased flow of saliva. The condition of the tongue became greatly aggravated as the disease progressed, the mouth and throat becoming ultimately very sore, with great constriction of the latter. The abdomen was distended, and very tender to the touch, the liver also being very full and tender. Pulse low and rapid, decreasing in fulness as the disease progressed, and reaching finally to 130 or 140; and the depression of spirits and sinking at the heart considerably increased. The patient appeared to be daily losing strength, and at each attack, which seemed to return periodically at intervals of about a fortnight, the same symptoms appeared more severely than before. Mr. Anderton seemed to be in the deepest distress. From the time when the symptoms first became serious, he hardly ever left her side, administering both food and medicine with his own hand. So far as I am aware, Mrs. Anderton took nothing of any kind from any other person throughout the greater portion of her illness. I have heard her say this herself, in his presence, shortly before her death. For the last few weeks she took scarcely any nourishment, and could with difficulty swallow her medicine. The principal cause of this difficulty lay in the extreme nausea which followed any attempt to swallow, but it was greatly increased by the painful and constricted state of the throat, which was extremely rough and raw, and rendered swallowing very painful. As the disease progressed, the vomited matter became strongly colored with bile, and was of a strong yellow color. The oppression on the heart also increased, until at length respiration was almost impeded. The heart and pulses also gradually lost power, and latterly the lower portion of the body was almost paralyzed, the limbs being stiff, and the whole frame, from the waist downward, very heavy and cold. The patient also suffered from severe cold perspirations, as well as from heat and irritation of the upper portion of the body, and from entire inability to sleep. A very remarkable feature in the case was, that notwithstanding this general sleeplessness, each fresh attack of the malady was preceded by a sound slumber of some hours' duration, from which she appeared to be aroused by the return of the more active symptoms of the disorder. I tried all the usual remedies indicated by such symptoms, but without any permanent effect, and I was a good deal perplexed by the anomalous appearance of the case, and especially by its intermittent character, the symptoms recurring, as I have said, with increased severity, at regular intervals of about a fortnight. I mentioned my difficulty to Mr. Anderton, and asked if he would wish further advice. At his urgent request I consented, though with some hesitation, to meet Baron R., who holds, as I was given to understand, a regular diploma from several of the foreign universities, but whose practice has been of a somewhat irregular character. I first consulted with him on the 12th of July. [Vide Sec. V., 5.]

[Dr. Dodsworth here details at some length how he became convinced of the Baron's great skill and knowledge of chemistry, and was finally persuaded to meet him in consultation.]

After examination of the patient, however, and some conversation as to the nature of the symptons and of the remedies employed, I had some difficulty in drawing from him (the Baron) any expression of opinion. He appeared, however, to agree entirely in the course hitherto pursued, and after some further conversation we separated. The consultation took place in Mrs. Anderton's dressing-room, and in passing by the wash-hand stand on his way out, the Baron suddenly took up a small bottle which was standing there, and turning sharply upon me, asked "if I had tried that?" On taking it from his hand, I found that it contained tincture of tannin, a preparation much used for the teeth. I was somewhat startled by the question, and replied in the negative, on which the subject was dropped. On my way home, however, I was again struck by the peculiarity of the Baron's manner in putting the question; and on thinking the matter over, the idea suddenly flashed across me that tannic acid was the antidote to antimony, and that the symptoms of poisoning by tartarized antimony, to which attention had just been drawn by Prof. Taylor, in the case of the Rugely murder, closely resembled in many respects those under which Mrs. Anderton was then suffering. At the first moment this supposition seemed to account for all the mysterious part of the case; but on reflection the difficulty returned, for it seemed impossible that the poison could have been administered by any one but Mr. Anderton himself, and I felt it still more impossible to suspect him of such an act, in face of the evident and extreme affection existing between them. On mature reflection, however, I determined on trying, at all events for a time, the course suggested by the Baron, and accordingly exhibited large doses Pernvian bark, together with other medicines of the same kind. My suspicion was at first increased by the improvement apparently effected by these remedies, and I took occasion to ask Mr. Anderton, in a casual way, in presence of the nurse and one of the servants, whether he had any emetic tartar or antimonial wine in the house. The manner of his reply entirely removed from my mind any idea that either of those present, at least, had any knowledge of such an attempt as seemed implied by the Baron, and on seeing that gentleman a day or two after, I questioned him as to the true bearing of his suggestion. He disclaimed, however, any such meaning as I had been disposed to attribute to his words, stating, in a general way, that he had before known great benefit to accrue from the exhibition of such medicines in similar cases, and expressing a hope that they might be successful in the present instance. Something, however, in his manner, and especially the great stress laid upon careful watching of the patient's diet while under this course of treatment, led me still to fancy that he was not so entirely without doubt as he wished me to believe; but that, on the contrary, his positions pointed towards Mr. Anderton, his friendship for whom made him desirous of concealing them. This opinion was confirmed by the recollection of another apparent instance of suspicion on the part of the Baron, to which, a few days previously, however, I had not at the time attached any importance. I accordingly continued the bark treatment, determining, should any fresh attack occur, to take measures for investigating the matter; for which purpose I gave private orders to the nurse, on whom I knew that I could thoroughly depend, to allow nothing to be removed from the room until I had myself seen the patient. The beneficial effects of the bark continued for about ten or twelve days, at the end of which period I was sent for hurriedly in the middle of the night, the disease having returned with greater violence than at any previous attack. Having done what was in my power to alleviate the immediate pressure of the symptoms, I took an opportunity of privately securing portions of the vomited and other matters, which I immediately had submitted to a searching chemical analysis. No trace, however, of antimony, arsenic, or any similar poison, could be detected, and as the tannic acid appeared now to have lost its remedial power, I came finally to the conclusion that its apparent efficacy had been due to some other unknown cause, and that the suspicions of the Baron were altogether without foundation. I continued the former treatment, varied from time to time as experience suggested, but without being able to arrest the progress of the disease, which I am inclined to think must have been constitutional in its character, and probably hereditary, as I learned from Mr. Anderton that the patient's mother had also died of some internal disease, the exact symptoms of which, however, he was unable to call to mind. Towards the close of the case the patient was almost constantly delirious from debility, and the immediate cause of death was entire prostration and exhaustion of the system. I wished Mr. Anderton to allow a post mortem examination, with a view to discovering the true nature of the disorder, but he seemed so extremely sensitive on the subject, and was in such a state of nervous depression, that I forbore to press the point. The Baron also seemed to discourage him from such an idea. Subsequently an order came for an inquest, and I then assisted at the analysis which followed, and which was performed by Mr. Prendergast. We found no traces of antimony in any part of the body or its contents. The report of Mr. Prendergast, in which I fully concurred, will show the result of the analysis. Looking at that, and at all the circumstances of the case, I was, and still am, convinced that Mr. Anderton was perfectly innocent of the crime imputed.

In answer to the queries forwarded at various times by Mr. Henderson, Dr. Dodsworth gives the following replies:

1. In questioning the Baron as to his suggestion respecting the tincture of tannin, I put it plainly to him whether he had been led to make it by any suspicion of poison. This he disclaimed with equal directness, but with such hesitation as convinced me that the suspicion was really in his mind.

2. I told the Baron that I had exhibited bark and other similar remedies, and with what success. He smiled, and turned the conversation.

3. The Baron was not present at the post mortem examination. He wished very much to be so, but Mr. Prendergast objected so strongly that I was obliged to refuse him. I promised, however, to let him know by telegraph the result of the examination, which took place at Birmingham, where Mr. Prendergast was living at the time. I enclose a copy of the message sent. He offered to assist in removing the intestines, etc., from the body, but this I also declined, as Mr. Prendergast had particularly requested me to allow no one to come near the body after it was opened but myself and some student or surgeon from one of the great hospitals, to render such assistance as might be necessary. The caution was, I think, a very reasonable one, and I followed it out strictly.

4. The Baron certainly seemed at first, as I thought, annoyed at being excluded, but I attributed this to his interest in the case. He did not make the request as to telegraphing at the time, but wrote to me afterwards on the subject.

5. The object of Mr. Prendergast's precaution was, of course, to prevent the body from being tampered with.

6. By tampered with I mean in such manner as to destroy the traces of the poison.

7. It would, of course, be possible to manufacture traces of poison where none had previously existed, but this could only be done with the view of fastening on an innocent person the guilt of a murder which had never been committed, and was by no means what we intended to guard against in the exclusion of his friends.

8. Certainly had such a thing been successfully attempted in this instance, it would have rendered the case conclusive against Mr. Anderton.

9. The other incident to which I have alluded, as evincing suspicion on the part of the Baron, was as follows: We were one morning in consultation in Mr. Anderton's room. I wished to seal a letter. The Baron lighted a taper for me with a piece of paper which he took from the waste basket. As he did so, he appeared struck with something on the paper, and untwisted it and showed it to me. There were only a few letters on it, part having been torn off and part burned. The letters were . . . RTAR EME . . . and part of what was evidently a T. Beneath was the upper portion of a capital P in writing. I did not, however, take much notice of it, and the thing passed from my mind.

10. I have no doubt myself that the paper came from the waste basket. The Baron said so. I did not actually see him take it out, but I saw him stoop to do so. There was nothing physically impossible in his having taken the paper from his own pocket, but I cannot see the slightest reason for such a supposition. The only object he could possibly have had in such an act would have been that of throwing suspicion on Mr. Anderton, and his whole desire evidently was to conceal the suspicions in his own mind as far as possible.

11. The Baron gave me no other grounds for supposing that he suspected anything. On the contrary, he was continually pointing out to me the affection of Mr. Anderton for his wife, and especially the assiduity of his attendance in permitting no one else to administer either food or medicine.

12. The practical effect of all this was certainly, I admit, to impress upon my own mind the suspicious circumstances of the case more strongly, perhaps, than if they had been pointed out in a directly hostile manner. It is impossible, however, that the Baron could have reckoned upon this, and I feel bound to add that it seems to me exceeding the limits of legitimate inquiry to suggest anything of the kind.

3. Statement of Mrs. Edwards.

I am a sick nurse. I was in attendance on poor Mrs. Anderton all through her sickness. The poor lady was greatly cast down. She was expecting her death for weeks before it came. She seemed to think there was a doom on her. I do not think she had any suspicion that she was being poisoned. I am sure, poor dear lady, no one would ever think of poisoning her; everybody loved her too much. Mr. Anderton was dotingly fond of her; I never saw so good a husband in my life. I could have done anything for him, he was so good to his poor wife. I don't think he hardly ever left her. I used to be vexed sometimes because I said he would not let me do anything for her. I mean he would not let me give her her slops or her physic. She took nothing but slops the best part of the time. She couldn't feel to relish anything at all, and meat made her vomit. For the last two months or better, I don't think she took anything from anybody, excepting it was from Mr. Anderton himself. He used to bring her her physic as regular as the clock struck, and everything from the kitchen was took first into his room if he wasn't with the mistress, and he would carry it to her himself. He used to have rare work sometimes to get her to take anything. I am sure she wouldn't have done it, poor lady, for any one but him; not for the last few weeks. She was so very sick and ill, and everything seemed to turn upon her stomach. Mr. Anderton always slept on a mattress in the mistress' room so as to be within call. The mattress was put on the floor by the side of the bed, and nobody could have got to the bed without waking him. He was a very light sleeper. The least little sound used to wake him, and I often told him he was going the way to kill himself, and then what would our poor lady do? Once or twice I persuaded him to go out for a bit, and then he always insisted on my not leaving the room while he was away. Even when he was in his study he always made me stay with the lady, and if I wanted to go out for anything, I was to ring for him. Mrs. Anderton was never left without one or other of us for an hour until the last six weeks, when she grew so bad, another nurse had to be got. Then we three did the same way between us. We were obliged to take her, because I was quite knocked up. How ever Mr. Anderton kept up the way he did, I cannot think or say, but he broke down altogether when the mistress died. I don't think after that the poor gentleman was ever quite right in his head. I remember the doctor asking him one day whether he had any tartar emetic in the house. He said no, but he would get some if it was wanted. Nothing more passed at the time, so far as I know. It was brought to my mind again by something which happened after the poor lady's death. It was nothing very particular, only I found in her room a piece of paper with "Tartar Emetic" printed on it. That was all that was printed, but the word "Poison" was written under it. I kept the paper and showed it to the Baron. I don't know why I did so; I suppose because he was in the house at the time. Afterwards I showed it to the lawyer, and he took charge of it. I had no particular suspicion, none at all. I can't tell why I took it up. I did it without thinking, quite promiscuous like. I didn't show it to master, because he was too ill to be worried. That was the only reason.

The above is the evidence I gave at the inquest. I have nothing more to add. I am quite sure that Mr. and Mrs. Anderton were very fond of each other. I never saw two people so affectionate like. The Baron was very foud of both of them. I don't think Mrs. Anderton liked him much. She seemed to have a sort of dread of him. I don't know why; she never said so. The Baron used often to call on Mr. Anderton, to see the doctor, but, so far as I know, he only saw the mistress once. I think he knew she did not like him, and kept away on purpose. He was a very kind-hearted gentleman. He was always particularly polite and civil-spoken to me. He used often to talk to me about master doting so on mistress. He used to speak about his always giving her her physic and things. I remember one day his saying it wouldn't be very easy to give her anything unwholesome without his knowing of it, or something of that sort. He seemed as if he never could say enough in praise of master, and I am sure he deserved it. I took him the paper I found just like I might take it to master if he had been well enough. He was in the house at the time. He had been in the poor lady's room with Dr. Dodsworth just before, and had stayed in the parlor to write something. He sent me into the room to see if he had left his glove there. It was in looking for it that I saw the paper. It was lying just under the bed when I stooped down to look for the glove. I took it up at first, thinking how careless it was to have left it there when the room was put straight after the poor lady died, and then I saw what was written upon it. The glove was lying on the floor close to it. There was no vallance to the bed, it had been taken off for the sake of sweetness. I forget exactly what the Baron said when I showed him the paper. It was something that made me think I might get into trouble about it. That was why I showed it to the lawyer. My brother had been to him once before about some money that ought to have come to us. He took the paper to the magistrates, and that was how the inquest came about. I was very angry about it, and so was the Baron. He asked me how I could have been so foolish. I don't know what made me think of taking it to him. I think it was something the Baron said. He did not advise me to do it. He did not advise me anything, but I think he wanted me to burn it. I offered it to him, but he said he was afraid, or something of that kind, and I think that was what put it into my head to ask the lawyer about it.

4.—Memorandum by Mr. Henderson.

The statement of the other nurse, herewith enclosed, merely corroborates that of Mrs. Edwards, with respect to such matters as came within her cognizance. I have therefore not thought it necessary to insert it here.

Mr. Prendergast's report, also enclosed, is somewhat lengthy, and of a purely technical character. It is to the following effect:

1. That, on examination, the body of the late Mrs. Anderton presented in all respects the precise appearance which would be exhibited in a case of poisoning by antimony.

2. It was nevertheless possible to account for these appearances, as the result of chronic gastritis, or gastro enteritis, though in some respects not such as either of those diseases would be expected to present.

3. The strictest and most thorough examination entirely failed in showing the very slightest trace of either antimony or arsenic; either in the contents of the various organs, or in the tissues.

4. A portion of the medicine last taken by the deceased was also examined, but equally without result.

5. From the lengthened period over which the poisoning, if any, must have extended, and the small doses in which it must have been administered, it is scarcely possible but that, had such really been the case, some traces of it must have been found in the tissues, though not perhaps in the contents of the stomach, etc.

6. In a case of poisoning also, the symptoms would have recurred in their severest form within a short period of taking the food or medicine in which it had been administered. In this case, however, they appear to have uniformly shown themselves at a late period of the night, and several hours after either food or medicine had been taken.

7. It is therefore concluded that, notwithstanding the suspicious appearance of the body on dissection, death is to be attributed not to poison, but to an abnormal form of chronic gastro enteritis, for the peculiar symptoms of which the exceptional constitution of the deceased may in some degree account.

5.—Statement of Police-Sergeant, Edward Reading.

I am a sergeant on the detective staff of the Metropolitan Police. In October, 1856, I was on duty at Notting Hill. I was employed to watch a gentleman named Anderton. He was in custody on a coroner's warrant for the murder of his lady, but couldn't be removed on account of being ill. I was put in the house to prevent his escape. I did not stay in his room. I did at first, but it seemed of no use; so I spoke to our superintendent, and got leave from him to stop in the outer room. I did this to make things pleasant. I always try to make things as pleasant as I can, compatible with duty, specially when it's a gentleman. It comes harder on them than on the regular hands, because they are not so much used to it. In this case prisoner seemed to take on terribly. He was very weak and ill—too ill, seemingly, to get out of bed. He used to lie with his eyes fixed upon one corner of the room muttering sometimes to himself, but I couldn't tell what. He never spoke to anyone. The only time he spoke was once, to ask me to let him see the body. I hadn't the heart to say no; but I went with him and kept at the door. He could hardly totter along, he was so weakly. After about half an hour, I thought it was all very quiet, and looked in. He was lying on the floor in a dead faint, and I carried him back. He never spoke again, but lay just as I have said. Of course I took every precaution. Prisoner's room had two doors, one opening on the landing, and the other into the room where I was. I locked up the outer door and put three or four screws into it from the outside. The window was too high to break out at, but our men used to keep an eye upon it from the street. At night I used to lock the door of my room and stick open the door between the two. I was relieved occasionally by Sergeant Walsh, but I mostly preferred seeing to it myself. I like to keep my own work in my own hands, and this was a very interesting case. When I first took charge I made a careful examination of the premises and of all the papers, and the like. I found nothing to criminate the prisoner. I found a journal of the lady who was murdered, with a note at the end in his handwriting; but so far as it went they seemed to be on very good terms. I found also a lot of prescriptions and notes referring to her illness, but no papers like that found by the nurse, nor any traces of powders or drugs of any kind. I went with the nurse into the bedroom of the murdered party, and made her point out the exact spot where the paper was found. According to what she said it was lying just under the bed on the right-hand side. The glove was lying close to it but not under the bed. Somehow I didn't quite feel as if it was all on the square. I thought the business of the paper looked rather queer. It didn't seem quite feasible like. I have known a thing of that sort by way of a plant before now, so I thought I'd just go on asking questions. That's always my way. I ask all kinds of questions about everything, feeling my way like. I generally find something turn up that way before I have done. Something turned up this time. I don't know that it was much—perhaps not. I have my own opinion about that. This is how it was. After more questions of one kind and another, I got to something that led me to ask the nurse which side of the bed Mr. Anderton usually went to give the lady food and physic. She and the other servants all agreed that, being naturally left-handed like, he always went to the left-hand side of the bed, so he could get to feed her with a spoon. He was very bad with his right hand. Couldn't handle a spoon with it any more than some of us could with the left. Nurse said she had seen him try once or twice, which he always spilled everything. I mean, of course, with his right hand. He was handy enough with his left. When I heard this I began to suspect we might be on a false scent. This is the way I looked at it. The glove, as I told you, was lying on the floor by the right side of the bed, so as anybody who dropped it must have been standing on that side, which it's natural to go to as being nearest the door. The paper was close to it, just under the same side of the bed. Now I took it as pretty clear, prisoner hadn't put that paper there for the purpose, but if he'd done it at all, he had dropped it by accident in giving the stuff. I fancy, too, he'd naturally be particularly careful in giving that sort of stuff not to spill it about the place, so he'd be pretty well sure to take his best hand to it. In that case he'd have dropped it on the left hand side of the bed—not the right. Still, of course, it might have got blown across, or, for the matter of that, kicked, though that was not very likely, as the bed was a wide one, and put in a sort of recess like, quite out of any sort of draught. So I thought I'd have another look at the place, and, poking about under the bed, I found a long narrow box, which the servants told me was full of bows and arrows, and hadn't been moved out of its place since they first came into the house. It took up the whole length of the bed within a foot or so, and lay right along the middle on the floor. There was a mark along the floor that showed how long it had been there. A bit of paper like that never could have got blown over that without touching it if there had been ever so much draught. When I got so far I fancied things began to look very queer, so I got the bed shifted out of its place altogether. The coffin was in the way, and I got that moved to one side of the room, and pulled the bed right clear of the box. As we shifted the coffin I thought I saw something like a piece of paper under the flannel shroud. I said nothing at the time, but waited till the undertaker's men were out of the room and I was alone. I then opened the shroud and found a small folded paper. It was put just under the hands, which were crossed over the bosom of the corpse. I opened it and found a lock of hair which I saw directly was Mr. Anderton's, and there were a few words in writing which I copied down in my note-book, and then I put the hair and the paper and all back where I found them. The writing was, "Pray for me, darling, pray for me." I knew the hand at once for Mr. Anderton's. His writing is very remarkable by reason, I suppose, of his being so left-handed. Of course that wasn't evidence, but somehow I got an idea out of it that a man wouldn't go on in that way with his wife after he'd been and murdered her. It struck me that would be against nature, leastways if he was in his right mind. After I had finished with the coffin I looked at the box. As I expected, the top was covered over so thick with dust, and it was pretty clear that, at all events, the bit of paper had never lain atop of it. I put a piece just like it on to try, and blew it off again, and it made a great mark and got all dirty. The paper picked up by the nurse was quite clean, or very nearly so. Putting all this together I came pretty nigh a conclusion that, at all events, it wasn't Mr. Anderton as had dropped the paper there. The sides of the box were also dusty, but there were marks on them like as if a brush or a broom had brushed against them. I put the box and the bed back into their places, and went down to question the housemaid. [The housemaid's deposition corroborates this part of the evidence.] I found that she had put the room tidy the day Mrs. Anderton died, and had passed a short hair-broom under the bed, as there were several things lying about. She said she was quite sure there was no bit of paper there then, as she had stooped down and looked under. I tried with the same broom, and you couldn't reach the box without stooping, as she said. I then inquired who had been in the room between the time of the death and the finding of the paper. No one had been there but the nurse, the doctor, the housemaid, and Baron R. I was determined to hunt it out if possible. I questioned the nurse and the housemaid—on the quiet, not to excite suspicion—but felt pretty clear they knew nothing more about it; and when next Baron R. came I sounded him about different points. He did not seem to know that Mr. Anderton was so left-handed, nor could I get any information from him on the subject. He didn't seem at first to see what I was driving at, and, of course, I didn't mean he should, but after a while I saw he had struck out the same idea as I had about the place where the paper was found, though I had not meant to let him into that. He seemed quite struck of a heap by it. I fancied at the moment that he turned regularly pale, but he was just blowing his nose with a large yellow silk handkerchief, and I could not be sure. He said nothing to me of what he had guessed, nor did I to him. I like to keep those things as quiet as I can, particularly from parties' friends. I have not been able to get any further clue, but I am convinced that something is to be made out of that paper business yet. I generally know a scent when I get on one, and my notion is that I am on one now. I did not see the Baron again till the evening before Mr. Anderton made away with himself. He came then in a great hurry, and insisted on seeing the prisoner. I said I would ask, but did not expect he could, as Mr. Anderton would see or speak to no one. He seemed to be in a sad state, partly with exhaustion after waiting on his wife so long, and partly with the worry of having this hanging over him. He was a very sensitive gentleman, and seemed to take it more to heart than any one I ever saw. He wouldn't see any one, not even his lawyer. When I told him about the Baron, however, he said he might come in, and they were together half an hour or more. I did not hear anything that passed. When the Baron came out he took me on one side and told me everything was all right, and his friend was sure to get off. He said he was overpowered with the good news, and particularly begged that he might not be disturbed by any one, as he thought he could sleep now. He had hardly slept a wink all the time. I promised not to disturb him, and he lay very quiet all night. I peeped in once or twice to make sure he was there, but did not speak. I noticed a faint smell like peaches once, but did not think anything of it. In the morning I went to take him his breakfast, and found him dead and quite cold. In his hand was a little bottle which had contained prussic acid, and which had evidently come from a pocket medicine chest that lay on the bed. I gave the alarm, and the divisional surgeon was sent for, but he was stone dead. At about 9 o'clock the Baron's servant came round to know whether he had left a pocket medicine-chest the night before. I questioned the servant, and found the Baron had given him a list of the places where he had been, and that he had asked at several already. The medicine chest wanted proved to be the one found in Mr. Anderton's room. On the pillow I found also a piece of paper in Mr. Anderton's handwriting, of which I enclose a copy.

6. Pencil note found on the pillow of Mr. Anderton.

Let no man condemn me for what I do. God knows how I have fought against it. My darling! my own darling! have I not seen you night and day by my side, beckoning me to come? Not while a chance remained. Not while there was one hope left to escape this doom of hideous disgrace which dogs me to the death. No, darling, my honor—your husband's honor before all. It is over now. No chance—no hope—only ignominy—shame, death. I come, darling. You know whether I am guilty of this horrible charge. My darling—my own darling—I see you smile at the very thought. God bless you for that smile. God pardon me for what I am about to do. God reunite us, darling.

Eating Asparagus.—When William the Third paid frequent visits to Moor-park, one day, Sir William Temple being laid-up with gout, the duty of attending the king devolved upon young Jonathan Swift, who got so much into his majesty's favor, that they dined together, and the king not only taught Swift how to eat asparagus in the Dutch manner, but offered to make him captain of a troop of horse. The latter Swift declined, but the asparagus lesson he put in practice. Alderman Faulkner, Swift's printer and publisher, being one day detained at the deanery, Swift made the alderman stay to dine, when asparagus formed one of the dishes; the dean helped his guest, who shortly called upon his host to be helped a second time; when Swift, pointing to the alderman's plate, said, "Sir, first finish what you have upon your plate." "What, sir, eat my stalks?" "Ay, sir! King William always eats the stalks!" This story was told by Faulkner to Dr. Leland, who asked, "And, George, what, were you blockhead enough to obey?" "Yes, doctor, and if you had dined with Dean Swift tête-a-tête, faith you would have been obliged to eat your stalks!"

The Old Morgue and the New.—Among the recent demolition in Paris is that of the old well-known Morgue. Not that this musée des morts has ceased to exist as an institution, for a much larger Morgue has been erected on the island immediately behind Notre Dame. In one apartment, lighted in the most effective manner, are twelve slabs of black marble, on which the unfortunate dead are laid; and in another apartment are fourteen similar slabs, destined for bodies that have become so decomposed that recognition is no longer possible. Bath-rooms are abundantly supplied with water, which falls continuously on the bodies. The clothes appertaining to the latter are suspended in a room in a very conspicuous manner, and, unless identified, remain exposed for a year.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1864.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS AND TIGHTS.

WOMAN'S rights have been the prolific theme of public dispute and discussion for a century past, but a public consideration of their tights has been reserved for the present day. Their most eminent interpreter and expounder, after a most successful sojourn among us, folded up her few garments like the Arab she occasionally personated, and as noiselessly stole away, to carry Cockneys captive as she already had carried Californians. But her mantle, or rather, her want of mantle or much else, fell upon apt shoulders after her translation to the shrouding fogs of London; the lessons which she inculcated were not lost; and a monetary index remained to point out to aspirants for the emoluments if not the laurels of of the stage the path to a popular success. That shrewd managers have availed themselves of the light—shall we say the light dress?—of her experience is scarcely to be wondered at, and the result is that Mazeppa has been played by an actress of repute in her profession to one of the largest houses ever seen in San Francisco, at one of our principal theatres, and is in active preparation at another.

Though it may be pleasant to preach, it is certainly wearisome to be preached to. Nothing can be further from our intentions than a transformation of these columns into an extempore pulpit, nor would we wrest a fruitful text from the hands of those who are ordained to deal with the moralities. We simply propose to call attention to the fact that clothes are not conducive to success on the stage, proving an obstacle rather than otherwise, while in the same connection we express our wonderment that they are not laid aside in the every-day walks of life.

Of course, we mean no reflection upon the stage: that managers will consent to starve, in order to uphold the dignity of the profession is a sacrifice not to be dreamed of, and to close their doors would be quite as bad as playing indifferent Hamlets to invisible audiences. It is not with the stage we are disposed to quarrel; it is with the people. It is not with those who cater for the popular taste that we find fault; it is simply the popular taste itself that we condemn. Managers are bound to make money, and the public, by its support, can always dictate what its entertainment is to be. Late experiments have made it apparent that the only way to win support to theatrical entertainment in this community is by an appeal to the rabble, and that managers in the future will appeal to much else it is useless to hope. The fact is an unpleasant one, but it is too palpable to admit of argument; so good-bye to the lyric stage, and farewell to the legitimate drama, while we patiently bow our heads to the tread of all manner of fiery and untamed steeds.

With Mazeppa as a moral agent we have nothing to do. Viewing it in an æsthetic sense, however, we have much to say. On abstract principles we are opposed to any play or anything that is calculated to bring out such a low, howling, brutal and positively vile audience as was assembled within the four walls of the Metropolitan Theatre last Wednesday evening. Such yells and hoots and cat-calls, such abounding vulgarity and such promiscuous indecency of conduct, were never shown by an audience in the Old Bowery in the worst days of that delight of Dead Rabbits, that Paradise of Plug Uglies. The fact that the bare announcement of Mazeppa brought out such an audience is an argument against the play, or sufficient at least to show the popular estimation in which it is held. There was a general supposition that something indecent was to be seen, and this filled the house; an assurance with the end of the second act that no such fruition would follow to crown their fond hopes, went well towards emptying it. Of course, we do not mean to say that all the audience belonged to that class of society which fills jails and penitentiaries and furnishes the gallows with occasional employment. Fifty respectable young men were advertised for, a week beforehand, to assist in the performance—if that number are to be found in the city they were in the house, doubtlessly, though behind the scenes. The grey heads of bankers and prominent public men were to be seen sprinkled through pit and parquet, and aristocratic faces looked out from private boxes. These people went from motives of curiosity, of course—thought they'd go "just once" and look; the fate of Peeping Tom had no warning for them. (It wouldn't do for Godiva to ride through the streets of this curious city, but let her advertise the performance to come off in an enclosure, with the proceeds of the show she could ransom twice a score of burghers. For almost every boy, adult and fool in town—the latter by themselves alone would fill the house every night for a month—would determine to go "just once.") This is all that is asked or expected, and the treasury is filled to overflowing. In the last production of Mazeppa there was nothing specially wrong or immodest. The consequence was that on the second night the audience dwindled down very considerably, and the chances are that the end of the present week will find the piece played to houses of the old pattern. The impression of "perfect propriety" that has got abroad must prove fatal, so far as a monetary success is concerned, though it is creditable to the management that in keeping the promise to the ear they broke it to the hope. It is a pity that the rabble on Wednesday evening were even regaled by the expectation of indecency, and so it is comparatively a pleasure to know that they were disappointed. But we regret the necessity of making that appeal, or perhaps we should say of yielding to the demand; for it furnishes a premonition of the time when Hamlet will be played by a woman in tights, the fate of the piece turning on the shape of a leg or the mould of a knee. Let it become fairly understood that such a thing will draw, and the public need have no fears but that managers will give it to them.

IS IT FAIR?

IN Ladies' Fairs, as popularly conducted, we have decidedly the most subtle means of extracting money from the pocket of unsuspecting males ever devised by those arch-enemies of our frank and yielding sex. Alchemists of old labored hard, but vainly, to coin gold from cheaper metals; ladies in the present day go even beyond the feat which sages singed their grey beards over crucibles in a vain attempt to accomplish, for they fish money from pockets where there is none, and sweep gold into the coffers of their charities under the pretext of giving value received, when in reality nothing is had in return. The Ladies' Christian Commission Fair now in progress offers an illustration of one and all of these phenomena. We venture to say that more money can be spent there in a less space of time than in any other place of entertainment in this city, and less shown for it when the thing is over. Men go in there with pockets buttoned and a grim resolution not to be done for. No use; a man who doesn't know a camelia from a cabbage, and who of the two vegetables would decidedly prefer the latter, is persuaded that of all things in life he most at that particular moment needs a rose in his button-hole. As though a rose in a man's button-hole were calculated to advance his material interests, or add to his social status! Nothing can be more incongruous or absurd; for the thing cannot be conveniently smelt of, and all attempts to enjoy the luxury must inevitably end in a dislocated neck or an injured spine, but a man without a rose in his button-hole since the Fair opened is an exception to the established rule, and people stare at him with curious eyes, as though he were a monster. Is it possible that grim, gruff men swallow the rose-bud for the sake of having a lady's jewelled fingers busy with their coat-lappel in arranging it?

We have said that the ladies have power to extort money from pockets where there is none; go to the Fair any time and you shall see this assertion proven. Men go there without money, and say so; they are broken, destitute, penniless—have not where to lay their heads that night. But the merciless reply is given: "You can borrow," or offers are made to sell on time, taking a gold watch, or some other little trifle as security—see the rascality of the fellows—and they don't take greenbacks.

Very few complain, however, and most men are willing to admit that the luxury, like liberty, is worth all it costs. It is something to be permitted to circulate through a room that brings up a vision of the hanging gardens of Babylon; flags and flowers on the walls and everyone wearing a floral favor in his left buttonhole—the only thing one has left. It is very pleasant at any time to circulate among Christians, and when the Christians are of the feminine persuasion, and young and pretty, the pleasure is increased by the whole force of the multiplication table. Of course, in the stern and meditative mind a conviction is felt that the Sanitary Commission was doing a very good work, and that this new charity cuts in upon its revenue and cannot do any better; but that is nothing. It is the flowers and the music, and the smiles that ripple from the little dears as they swindle you, that people go in for and pay their money for; the claims of the rival Commissions are not thought of, and the purpose to which the money is to be applied probably isn't thought of more than a dozen times in the evening. It is worthy of remark that the people who stand and deliberate much in these matters, measuring and squaring everything by rule, and acting only from some vague spring which they call "a sense of what is right," never spend much anyway, and their absence or presence does not diminish or increase the receipts of a fête in any degree worth mentioning. So let fêtes and fairs of all kinds go on as fast and frequently as possible; it is certain they will not last much longer than the spare change of the community does.

Our Country is a pretty little pamphlet containing selections from an unpublished patriotic poem of that title by Mrs. S. M. Clarke. It is offered for the benefit of the "Fair of the Christian Commission," now in progress. It is published by Roman & Co., from whom, with the exception of the two specified, all the books mentioned in this issue, come, and of whom they may be purchased.

NEVER did morning wear to evening, but some heart was broken.

NEW BOOKS.

Jomini's Life of Napoleon, translated by Maj.-Gen. Halleck and published by the house of Van Nostrand, eminent as the publishers of military works, has been laid upon our table by Roman & Co., the enterprising firm which supplies this coast with all of the new and choicest books. It consists of four large and beautiful volumes, accompanied by an atlas, which is particularly valuable not only as an illustration of the work itself, but also as a key to Napoleon's campaigns. The first volume contains a sketch of the life and writings of Gen. Jomini, interesting to the student as well as to the soldier. We see the peculiar bent of the author's mind, which sent him to the field, as surely as contrary tendencies have sent men to the pulpit and the bar; he was destined for a general, and his analytic mind made him an author. Moving prominently in the great game played upon those bloody squares for which Europe furnished the checkered board, and associating intimately with the hand which guided the pieces and for a time controlled the destinies of the other players, Jomini had excellent facilities as well as a natural adaptation for the prosecution of the work of which Gen. Halleck has furnished a translation—the first translation, let us here remark, that has yet been made in English. The inquiry has been started: How did Gen. Halleck find time, among his arduous duties, to make the translation? That question is answered by the translator himself in a short preface, wherein he states that it was done during a seven months' voyage from New York to California in 1846, undertaken partly as a military study and partly to beguile the tediousness of a voyage round Cape Horn. For sixteen years the manuscript was laid aside, and it would probably have been suffered to repose in oblivion for sixteen years more had not the present war made such a work marketable and proper.

Jomini opens his history with a prologue somewhat after the manner of one of the old Greek plays, manifesting a certain intention of scenic effect which one would scarcely look for in a soldier, though he manages his machinery in a very simple way. The curtain rises and discloses the shade of Napoleon on the shores of the Elysian fields. All the heroes and generals of old press to meet him as he disembarks from Charon's skiff, and with a rather inexcusable curiosity and certainly an inordinate haste, they ply the stranger with questions immediately he sets his feet on the beach. Foremost are Alexander, Cæsar, and Frederick; Alexander, who penetrated India with his armies and returned victorious, wants to know why Napoleon retreated from Moscow; Cæsar, who never was conquered, asks the illustrious stranger why he allowed his eagles, or rather the tri-colors, to be borne down at Leipsic and Waterloo; and Frederick, for private reasons of his own, asks an explanation of the prompt destruction of his monarchy and of its brilliant resurrection in 1813. Without taking a seat or stopping to brush the dust from his immortal clothes, Napoleon replies to this noble Areopagus by a brief little story of his life, which occupies the four portly volumes before us, and doubtless caused the ghostly inquisitors to wish they had been less precipitate with their questions.

The story is told in the first person. Commencing with his birth it marches on with the stateliness of an epic, swelling like a battle hymn, to close with his retirement from France and the committal of his person to the tender mercies of England, and the sad sequel of his death at St. Helena, whither the hospitable Britons exiled their guest. It is as interesting as a romance. We follow the victorious standard of the conqueror through campaign after campaign, and gaze upon his steady columns as they wheel into battle line, always certain of triumph and never dreaming of defeat—for Napoleon leads them. The Pyramids, Marengo, Ulm, Austerlitz, Jena, Wagram, Dresden, Montmirail, Ligny—there is a record to atone for one Waterloo, a scroll of fame to beacon soldiers on to meet even an exile's death. Our admiration is awakened for the wonderful man, so proud in his self-reliance, so quick in thought, so prompt in action, and so fertile inexpedient, never disheartened for a moment, though the tide of battle seems rolling against him, but by some brilliant inspiration of genius seizing the moment and snatching a splendid victory, where another less gifted in brain and soul had gathered only disaster.

It is, manifestly impossible for the civilian to sit in criticism upon the work of a thorough general. Were it possible, we would like to give copious extracts from this history, especially from those pages whereon the great battles are painted, but this is an indulgence which time and space necessarily forbid. Of course it is patent to the reader that the history is not an impartial one, for it is the work of an enthusiastic admirer of the hero. Napoleon is on trial, as it were, before the great generals of antiquity and the captains who made themselves illustrious in the era preceding his reign, and this work is a defense of his military conduct—an argument, and his own argument, in his favor. It is not confessed that he ever made a serious blunder, and very few errors are admitted. Grouchy is made responsible for Waterloo, and to the ingratitude of republics and not to his own ambition is laid his final downfall. He closes the recital of his life-history, however, by declaring that to the reproach of ambition he can say with Mahomet:

> Je fus ambitieux * * * * *
> Mais jamais roi, pontife, ou chef ou citoyen
> Ne conçut un projet aussi grand que le mien.

At the conclusion of the Napoleonic narrative the illustrious auditors express themselves satisfied—the Areopagus is content; Alexander applauds, Cæsar comments, and Frederick fires with enthusiasm. Having passed this ordeal safely, we scarcely think Napoleon will have anything to fear from catechism by any of our generals of the present war, should he chance to meet them in the shades. We omitted to mention that the notes which accompany the work are those of the translator and not of Jomini, the latter being embodied in the text.

Thackeray says of novels that they are sweets: All people with healthy literary appetites love them—almost all women; a vast number of clever, hard-headed men. Judges, bishops, chancellors, mathematicians, are notorious novel-readers, as well as young boys and sweet girls, and their kind, tender mothers. We may add, it is also certain that a great many with unhealthy literary appetites love them, and that a great multitude of sentimental women and spoony men and girls and boys, who might be much better employed, dissipate upon them to a dangerous degree. Two novels claim notice this week. Naomi Torrente is written by Gertrude F. De Vingut, a portrait of the authoress forming the vignette of the book. It is a tropical face, and one which has its reflection on every page of the work. The story is of a girl who married a man for whom she had a feeling somewhat warmer than friendship but scarcely akin to love. After marriage affection came on her side, or something approaching to it, while the husband became indifferent and showed a weakness for another lady. Naomi had a passionate, proud heart, and, after catechising him on the subject, stole away the next morning, leaving nothing but a note behind her. We meet her subsequently as a prima donna, famous, successful, and, best of all, beautiful. A young Cuban, who, by the way, was already engaged to a pretty Havanese, falls madly in love with her and the passion is reciprocated, but neither tells it. There is a little by-play with the Havanese, and Naomi and the young man she is sweet upon become separated, each only conscious of an individual passion and not dreaming that it is returned. Finally they meet in Venice; Naomi faints, and after restoring her to consciousness the young man says adieu, para siempre. Naomi buries her pain in her pride, and by and by goes to sing in London. London is calculated to kill even coal-heavers—let alone prime donne—and Naomi dies there, her death accelerated by seeing a paragraph containing an announcement of Justo's marriage in the papers. Her body is buried in accordance with her wishes, and a package which she left in her escritoire is forwarded to Justo at Havana: it tells him her love. He, as in duty bound, is much agitated when he receives it, and his wife asks him what the matter is; he very wisely does not enlighten her as to details, and there the story ends—perhaps in the best way it possibly could, for Naomi had one husband alive, Justo was married, and another meeting could but have been productive of trouble. The story is by no means a bad one, and there is a deal of power in its plan as well as in its telling—the moral is a florid one.

The other novel which claims attention is The Ladder of Life, by Amelia B. Edwards, published in pamphlet form and bearing the seal of the Harpers as a "select novel." It has merit, and conveys the impression of being written by a woman familiar with the languages and music—an acquaintance which she at times takes pains to display—and also possessed of sufficient knowledge of the human heart and its workings to enable her to stumble upon occasional truths. The main plot, plan, moral or what you like of the story is, that first loves are not fatal, and that a woman may survive a separation and "marry another" without at all sacrificing her comfort and happiness. Natalie, the heroine, is left an orphan, and a youthful engagement springs up between her and the son of her patroness. This does not fill the mother's views, and so Natalie is packed away from Fribourg—where the scene of the story opens—to be shelved for awhile in England, having first kindly consented to thus sacrifice herself in order to please the ambition of the mamma, and further the future of the boy. On getting to London she is decoyed away at the railroad station and robbed, finally finding refuge with a poor but respectable musician. She has vicissitudes, and wades through a marvellous sea of experiences, eventually becoming a prima donna of wondrous success and an intimate of Malibran. To cut the story short and bring it at once down to a fine point, she at last meets Louis—her first lover—and his mamma, under very exciting circumstances, but without a single heart-throb, and marries a young sculptor, whom she had known in girlhood, and loved—as a brother. The story is somewhat improbable in plot, and the details are not artistically grouped, but it interests; and the denoument in not having Natalie marry her first lover, after all the long years of cruel separation, has the charm of novelty in the pages of a romance, though the sequel is a very common one in real life.

A Woman's Philosophy of Woman, or Woman Affranchised, translated from the French of Mme. d'Hericourt, is one of the best books ever written by a woman on the woman question. That women have ever written very good books about themselves we do not pretend to say, but the theme is one they are tolerably well acquainted with, and in treating of it they are apt to be less stupid than man. Of the book before us we can conscientiously say that the style is clear, the logic good; the ideas, in the main, are sensible. The greater part of the work is occupied with criticisms of Michelet, Comte, Legouvé, Girardin and other authors. The tone of thought is serious, but the authoress takes a very advanced position—a fact which will be manifest when we state that she is in favor of divorce at will.

"David Gray's Poems" appears on the back of a very neatly printed volume. But it is the sketch of David Gray's life which prefaces the book that lends an interest to the poems, for it is the old story. David Gray was a self-educated Scotch boy, the son of a hand-loom weaver of Markland. He had strong poetic aspirations, and an unbounded faith in his own destiny. And he sought London with a dreamy vision of bursting upon that city as a literary meteor and woofing the world with the golden tissue of his fame. Wearily and vainly he sought a publisher—and died. Before leaving Scotland he had made the acquaintance of Richard Monekton Milnes, through a letter, and upon him he called on his first arrival in London. Mr. Milnes tried to persuade him to return to Scotland and become the preacher for which his studies had fitted him; but no: he saw a brighter crown dancing before his eager eyes and was determined to grasp it. He seems to have written clever, bold, self-asserting letters to nearly all the eminent men of letters whom he knew, claiming kindred and asking help. The following is the beginning of a note addressed to Sydney Dobell, at Cleeve Tower, Cheltenham:

"First—Cleeve Tower I take to be a pleasant place, clothed with ivy and shaded by ancestral beeches; at all events, it is mightily different from my mother's home. Let that be understood distinctly.

"Second—I am a poet. Let that also be understood distinctly.

"Third—Having at the present time only 8s. a week, I wish to improve my position, for the sake of gratifying and assisting a mother whom I love beyond the conception of the vulgar.

"These, then, are my premises, and the inference takes the form of this request: Will you, a poet, as far as you can, assist another, a younger poet (of twenty) in a way not to wound his feelings or hurt his independency of spirit?"

Dobell became interested in the young man, though the following foolish vaticination rather provoked him:

"I tell you that, if I live, my name and fame shall be second to few of any age, and to none of my own. I speak thus because I feel power. Nor is this feeling an artificial disease, as it was in Rousseau, but a feeling which has grown with me since ever I could think."

A reply was elicited which David characterizes as "pretty heavy," and in a subsequent letter dismounts from his stilts, abandoning what Dobell calls a "flatulent 'consciousness of power,'" but writing a few days afterwards:

"People don't seem to understand me. . . . Westminster Abbey! I was there all day yesterday. If I live I shall be buried there—so help me God! A completely deprived consciousness of great poetical genius is my only antidote against utter despair and despicable failure."

With an estimate so exaggerated of his own powers, David's lot in life would have been a rough one, and perhaps it is better for him that he died. However, he found friends, who took the kindliest interest in him, and who, when the seeds of consumption developed and it was evident that a speedy grave and not in Westminster Abbey awaited him, attended him with gentle offices and words, secured him medical treatment and conveyance to his home, and even procured the publication of some of his poems in time for him to see one of the proof-sheets—he saw it the day before he died. It is worthy of remark that the longest poem of the book, "The Luggie," was sent to the Cornhill Magazine, with a note of recommendation by Mr. Milnes. Thackeray rejected it, and we cannot blame him, for a poem more unsuited to the pages of a popular periodical it would be difficult to conceive. Had David Gray lived, we fear he never would have tasted the realities of that fame whereof he dreamed. For it seems to us that he fell into the very common error of mistaking a faculty of appreciation for the power of creation, and that the poetic aspirations which filled his breast were mistaken by him for the welling fires of genius. His verse is pure and sweet and tender, but there is little in it to hand the author's name down the aisles of Fame.

The memoirs of his life—a life of which he himself pathetically writes—

'Twas not a life,
'Twas but a piece of childhood thrown away,

are eminently interesting, and the publishers say that a generous portion of any profits which may accrue from the sale of the volume shall be sent to the hand-loom weaver and his wife, the parents of David Gray, who still reside in Markland, on the banks of the Luggie.

We had thought the novel list ended, but another one claims attention. Virginia Townsend thinks that we do not hold our birthright in sufficient honor, and hence The Battle-fields of our Fathers. The story is a pleasant one, opening with New England life in 1774, gathering interest with the throes which were consequent upon the colonies' declaration of liberty, and culminating with the golden peace which followed when they had achieved it. We have the fragrant breath of meadows and of orchards, loving couples, contumacious, villainous tories, and all ends with happy weddings. Edward Dudley, the nephew of a clergyman, is foremost in the fight—laying aside his Bible for a musket—and his patriotism is blessed as it should have been; he escapes bullets and sabres, and lives to wed Grace Palmer and an enjoyment of domestic happiness and a parsonage. All are killed who ought to be, all are married that deserve the fate; and the authoress, after writing of our fathers' deeds of heroism and sacrifices, suggests that all over this land the old heroism and sacrifices have been made real again, and the children have stood up to dare and to suffer in the places of the fathers and mothers—dismissing her heroes and heroines with a benediction and the following devout prayer, in which all who read will join her:

"As for them the morning rose after the long night, so God grant it may arise on us, and that we keep unbroken and undivided the inheritance they left us—an inheritance for which is now being poured out on many a fearful battle-ground blood as free and life as precious as those which have rendered sacred the battle-fields of our Fathers."

Libby Life is the experiences of a prisoner of war in Richmond in 1863–64, pleasantly told by Lieut.-Col. Cavada. The gloomy narration of prison life is diversified and enlightened by amusing anecdotes and laughable episodes, so that all is not a history of horrors.

The remark with which the above paragraph closes does not apply to the Report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, for a copy of which we are indebted to the Rev. Dr. Bellows. The evidence collected by the Committee of the Fort Pillow massacre, and the recital of the condition of returned prisoners, causes one to clench his teeth as he shuts the book, and ask if such enormities can be perpetrated and thunderbolts be while lie idle in heaven.

SUUM CUIQUE.

SAYS the old basket-maker in John Sterling's Onyx Ring: "I was a fool when I was young and I did not know it, and I thought myself ill-treated: I am a fool now, but I do know it, and so I am content." This is an illustration of a personal perception of one's own worth and position in society, and a philosophic contemplation of it, which is savory and smacks of wisdom. It recognizes that sound and inherent principle of human nature that there must be "hewers of wood and drawers of water." Not all can be leaders if they would. Demagogism may talk otherwise, but the results of all intellectual-equality schemes will be failures Vanity, ambition, jealousy and the small weaknesses of men will try to elevate the machinist to the pulpit, or turn the artist to merchandise, or lead the farmer to the bar. It is thus that so much talent is wasted to the world. Good is good, and can be shown by the coal-heaver, the waterman, or the sculptor alike. They display, to be sure, a diversity of gifts, but the same spirit:

Who sweeps a room but by God's laws,
Makes that and the action fine.

It is the bounden duty of parents to study the natural bent of the minds of their children, and after discovering it, to lead them in the way thereof. There is a moral obligation in it. Many an otherwise happy soul has struggled through a wearisome life and failed of any success, from this utter misconception of taste or capacity on the part of friends, and perhaps a foolish prejudice against every occupation outside of one of the learned professions. If the professions were weeded of all their unsuccessful, incompetent and unskilful members, the other vocations of life might in many instances be enriched indeed, and theology, medicine and law be left none the more poorly represented. And so of every other calling. The circumstances of a man's birth may and oftentimes do control him for awhile, but his native talent if unrepressed will eventually assert itself.

It is better to be a good compositor than a poor editor; a good farmer than a disqualified judge; a good machinist than a poor preacher. Let it be discovered to each man his sphere, and he will walk therein easier and more successfully.

Because my neighbor produces from the kettle-drum harmonies unknown to the reach of my poor musical faculties, shall I therefore deafen my friends by a constant racket from a borrowed bugle? Because the poetry if not the religion of motion seemed to ripple out from the graceful bewilderment which allured us to Mlle. Ellsler, shall we all therefore become dancers? And, on the other hand, because critics praise my pictures and my books, or my parish holds within its limits the intellectual and the wealthy of my town, is it therefore wise, or heroic, or manly for me to stilt myself upon my talents and good fortune to overlook the invention of some great labor-saving machine, and decry the value to the æsthetic, moral or religious world of any minds but those which are altogether and only scholarly? Where is the generosity, where the magnanimity, where the chivalry of such a creed? For the well-being of mankind in all its phases we almost believe the writer of a good cook-book, the modeller of a yacht America, the inventor of a sewing-machine, to be as worthy as many artists, many authors, and many of our preachers.

But this is a digression. The object is to impress this one idea on our readers' minds, that if a man suspect he have one talent, even, let him discover it, cultivate it, and be content. He will receive his reward. The men or women who can do one thing well are rare, and when known are to be recognized and praised. The maxim, "Jacks-of-all-trades are good at none," is very sound. The great men of history are distinguished and historic for one thing alone, and with their names we associate always the successes they achieved in one path of business or profession.

"Each to his own" is one thing needful for our social prosperity, but we shall wait long before, if ever, it so inweaves itself into the character of our national Utopia that history will record, "Here flourished a nation of which its people found and increased each his own talent, and there was peace throughout its borders."

THE "JAMSETJEE JEEJEEBHOY."

IT is now exactly a year ago that the Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy, a teak-built, copper-bottomed steam-transport, started from Singapore with a cargo of Hindu convicts, sentenced to transportation in the Andaman Islands.

This transport, named after its original proprietor, the benevolent Parsee merchant, had been hired by our Government to carry native convicts, a most strange gang of whom filled it between decks on the June evening, 1862, that followed that in which the ship left its anchorage.

The first few hours after leaving port are full of bustle and excitement—there is rope to coil away, cargo to shake into its place; the men need an hour or two to forget their license on shore, and to return to steady discipline. By and by, every one gets into his own groove, the sails fill, the ropes tighten, the rudder works, the ship "gets her stride," she forgets the land, and away she goes, true and steadfast, on her destined mission.

This transformation, this taming-down, had taken place on board the Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy. The carpenter was busy arranging the hatchway for the prisoners' sleeping-berths; the second-mate was superintending the transfer of stores from one part of the hold to another; the men were splicing and knotting, scraping and scouring; the doctor was rating the "loblolly boy," a tall, freckled, ungainly Scotch lad, Sandy Patterson, who was always pondering over an old copy of the Seaman's Manual, when he ought to have been compounding medicines; and the boatswain was reviling Jack Davis, the ship's boy, a brave little fellow, but rather too fond of mischief.

The ship was like a great sea-bird, which, ere it finally quits land, rests a moment on some foreland to prune its wings and ruffle out its plumage for its long flight. The great white canvas was shaking out aloft; the vessel rose buoyantly upon the large waves; cheering shouts ran from stem to stern; the boatswain's whistle piped shrill and chidingly; the vessel began to "walk," as sailors call it, before as fresh a gale as captain could desire to have at his back.

The convicts on board were Sikh fanatics, chiefly from Lahore and Umritsur. They were followers of that pseudo-prophet, Baloo Singh, who had all but excited an insurrection in the Punjaub. By trade a tailor, he had declared himself to be Baluk Singh, the founder of the sect, who died sixteen years ago, risen from the dead to preach down suttecism, and to expel the English. This dangerous man's disciples wore black and yellow turbans, rosaries of white woollen cord; practised military drill, and used the words "Wah Gooroo" as their mystic watchwords. The only good thing about the deported sect was, that they preached temperance, cleanliness and truth-telling. In all other respects, these Hindu fanatics were as sensual, blood-thirsty and insane scoundrels as ever abused the name of religion. They had been several days on board before the ship left port, under the somewhat loose guard of the second-mate, a mere youth, in the service of the company to which the steamer belonged.

It was just sunset—such a sunset as can only be seen in such seas as the convict vessel was now traversing—a sunset as unlike an English sunset as a daisy is unlike the Marvel of Peru—one of those volcanic outbursts of golden flame, and streams of crimson, and wafts of purple fire, and rainbow radiance of green and yellow, that seem to mantle the whole western sky and turn the ocean to a whirlpool of blood. It was coloring all the sails and ropes and every plank of the convict vessel, and bathed the walls of the state cabin, where the officers were just sitting down to dinner.

The bell had rung and the steward had brought in the soup; but one officer, the ensign in charge of the convicts, still stood at the cabin window, watching the burning path the setting had cast upon the tranquil ocean.

The doctor laughed, and said: "When I was eighteen I used to lock at sunsets; now, I only regard them as signals for dinner. Come, Crawford, the chaplain is waiting to say grace. We are not to wait for the captain."

The ensign colored, and took his place; he was thinking of other scenes far away across the sea.

The party consisted of the captain, Crawford, the doctor, the chaplain, the first-mate, and a second ensign.

"How's the Rajah to-day?" said the first mate to the doctor.

"Oh, well enough; but the rascal misses his opium, and shams ill. Soup, Jobson!"

"Thank you. I should like to give him a round dozen. I catch him sometimes looking murder out of the corner of his eye."

At that moment the captain entered, and laying his cap and double glass on a side table, bowed to the company and took his place at the head of the table.

"Always some worry," he said, "in this delightful life of ours. Now it is that boy Davis falls down the companion-ladder, larking; now it is a head-wind that keeps us at four knots an hour; by and by, we find all the coal on board is bad, and the engineer does nothing but grumble at the little heat it gives. And yet these young gentlemen (looking at the ensigns) rave over their cigars about the glorious life of a sailor! Pshaw! we always like what we haven't got. I should like them to have our work, Mr. Jobson, (to the first mate) for four-and-twenty hours—that'd sicken them."

Mr. Jobson laughed, as in duty bound.

"Glass of wine, Captain Favers?" said Crawford.

"With pleasure. Steward, hand Ensign Crawford the sherry."

"We shall have a fine passage," said the chaplain.

"May be, if the wind keeps up." The captain was evidently put out. "But hang me at highwater mark, if I would not rather carry parrots and monkeys than these niggers, with their particular food and their perpetual complaints."

The soup was removed and the second course was brought in. The steward had just lifted the cover from a magnificent joint of beef, that smoked like a great sacrifice, when Patterson entered and whispered in his ear.

The captain threw down the knife and fork in a big pet. "There again," he said. "Here, Mr. Jobson, take the joint. Not a moment, night or day, one's own. Excuse me, gentlemen; a sea-captain's everybody's servant."

There was a howl heard, and the next moment the captain entered, red and furious.

"Mare's nest again," he said. "By Jove, sir, if that boy Patterson didn't call me out, doctor, to tell me that there was a mutiny going to break out among the convicts. 'Why?' said I. 'Because I heard them whisper together,' said he, as cool as you like. 'Blockhead and lubber,' said I, giving him a backhander, 'what harm can niggers, whom I could snap over my knee, do by whispering? Let them whisper; and if you come and interrupt me again with your mares' nests, by Jove, sir, I'll keelhaul you.'"

"Well, that's very odd," said the chaplain, "for this morning, when Davis brought the coffee to my berth, he told me he was afraid to tell the mate, but he was sure that there was mischief brewing among the Hindus. He told me one of the men had seen the Rajah, as they call him, slip one hand nearly out of his handcuffs."

"Nonsense!" said the mate. "I examined every handcuff myself at eight bells. Those boys are the pest of the vessel with their cock-and-bull stories. If I see them again near the prisoners, I'll keep them all day scraping the mast."

"Crawford and I always sleep with revolvers under our pillows," said the second ensign; "and there's a sentinel at their door night and day."

"Mutiny be ——," said the captain testily, "and revolvers, too. If the fellows did rise, I'd tame them in five minutes with the ship's fire engine."

"An excellent thing for lowering the pulse," said the doctor. "By the by, Crawford, you must remember I challenge you to chess to-night."

"Here's the mate to check you," said Crawford, pointing to Jobson.

"Jobson's hard to beat," said the doctor; "but I back the chaplain."

That night, in the dead of the darkness, the boy Davis, who had fallen asleep in the cook's galley, was awakened by a storm of musketry, a splash overboard, a clash of sabres, groans, shouts and cries.

As he lay irresolute and frightened, a hairy, bony hand clutched him by the arm; then a voice he knew to be Patterson's cried: "Davis, the villains have risen and murdered every soul on board save us and the firemen—but three, and those they're chasing into the state-cabin. They've put a guard over the engine room. I stumbled over the captain just now; he was stabbed at the companion-ladder. O God, guide us! Davis, He is guid and great, and He holds the seas in the hollow of His hand. He is a strong tower and a fortress. Davis, pray, for here they come."

A dozen ship's lanterns moved swiftly towards them, and the next moment the two boys were in the clutch of a dozen Hindus, whose white tunics were splashed with the blood of the murdered men.

They were about to plunge their bayonets into their kneeling victims, when their leader, the Rajah, appeared, and with his sabre struck up their weapons as he shouted the watchword of the sect, "Wah Gooroo!"

The Rajah was a fat, smooth-faced Hindu, with small, half-shut eyes, and a cruel mouth. He had the captain's double glass slung round him, and the captain's gold watch-chain twisted round his black and yellow turban.

Davis clung to his feet, and prayed for his life.

"Hooly, hooly, Jack," said Patterson to him, but without looking towards his companion; "let me alone wi' the bluid-thirsty deevil, and I'll try him wi' just a word or two of his ain lingo that I picked up at Singapore. They wunna twist our thrapples if I can help it. No fear, man; we must make the best of a bad business. Speak them gently, man, and don't screigh there as if you'd got a dizzen knives in your wame."

Patterson was a rawboned Scotch lad, ungainly in body, large-footed, red-haired, shambling. But he was a brave, thoughtful, shrewd lad, and forgot his own danger in his care for his younger companion.

He did not utter these exhortations in one breath, but piecemeal, as they were both led to the state-cabin, where Baloo Singh was now enthroned.

"Take heart, Jack," he said: "remember how David, the son of Jesse, slew the big thief of a giant wi' a wee flint-stane."

"I am not afraid, Sandy," replied the little fellow, his cheek flushing; "I'm only a wee skeared. Look! the murdering rogues, they've got poor Mr. Jobson."

"God help him!" said Patterson.

"Poor Mr. Jobson!" groaned Jack: "look, how he's cut on the forehead."

In the cabin, with one foot on the dead body of the murdered captain, sat the chief fanatic, Baloo Singh. He was a tall, thin man, with dead-colored eyes, a face of a corpse color, blue lips, and long shrivelled hands. He sat erect, with no trace of human expression upon his face. He certainly acted well the part of a resuscitated dead man. Thirty or forty Hindus, mad with excitement, stood round their leader, holding lighted candles, boarding-pikes, blood-stained sabres, and ship-muskets still smoking at the muzzles.

"Worship him, worship Baluk Singh," they cried, as they dragged the unfortunate mate to the feet of their chief.

The brave man stood erect, without a look of fear.

"I be cussed if I do!" he said, and turned his head, and spat on the ground.

The chief made a sweeping movement with his right hand, and the mate was dragged from the room. There was a struggle, a yell and a pistol-shot, then silence.

"Wah Gooroo!" shouted the fanatics with one voice.

"Wah Gooroo!" said Baloo Singh, with a voice that seemed to rise from a tomb. "So perish the unbelievers!"

A weasel-faced Hindu, thin as a girl, and his dark, mean features almost hidden by rank, straight, black hair, now seized Patterson, and, sabre in hand, dragged him to the feet of Baloo Singh.

"Guid-bye, Jack," said Patterson, with a rueful grimace, and clasping the boy's hand. "It's guid-bye to my harns [brains] now—the dour deevils. Yet God's still aboon a', and I'll hae a try for my life still."

"Hadji Hanna, the bloated wretch we have already seen, stepped forward, and sticking his fat fingers in the red hair of the Scotch lad, raised a carving-knife that he had snatched from the steward's pantry.

"Son of Heaven," he said to his chief, "let us sacrifice this unbeliever to the goddess Khalee: she has told us to purge sea and land of these infidels, who deny your resurrection."

"Good-bye to old Aberdeen!—the Lord have mercy upon me!" groaned Patterson. Then a sudden light came in his eye, and he struggled forward and seized the robe of the false prophet. "Baloo Singh, son of Heaven!" he cried in broken Hindustance, "I worship thee."—(Then, under breath: "Haud up your heart, Jack; there's precedent for it. Remember Naaman bowed himself in the house of Rimmon.") "There is but one god, and Baloo Singh rose from the dead to be his Prophet."

"Let him go—he is one of us! Wah Gooroo!" cried Baloo Singh.

"Wah Gooroo!" shouted the disciples.

Hadji Hanna put a yellow and black turban on Patterson's head, and bound round his waist the mystic knotted cord.

"This lad, too," said Patterson, pushing forward Jack, "is also a believer; the miracles wrought to-day have convinced us both. Baloo Singh, son of Heaven, we are your slaves."

Again the shout of "Wah Gooroo!" was raised.

"Sons of the unbelievers, saved by Heaven from the doom of thy race! your lives are given back to you!" exclaimed the corpse-like chief. "Hadji Hanna, put on this younger convert the turban and the cord: these converts will help us with the accursed vessel."

"The gabblin' skate," muttered Patterson; and then he shouted like a madman the watchword, "Wah Gooroo!" till he was out of breath.

"Stay below here till we have proved your fidelity," said the chief, rising; "you shall wait on ourselves, and help to steer the vessel. Khalee still cries for victims. Come, Hadji Hanna—come, my disciples—come, and let us perfect the work."

As he uttered these words, the chief left the cabin, followed by the other fanatics. Hadji Hanna stayed for a moment behind. "Beware!" he said, with a hand on the throat of either lad: "any treachery, and you die by my hand. You are now followers of the great Son of Heaven, Baloo Singh. I place two armed men on the cabin-door; if you move from the door, they shoot you both, and fling you to the sharks." As he uttered these threats, Hadji Hanna's bloodshot eyes glared on the two survivors.

The next moment, the door closed behind him, the key turned, and there was a sound of two muskets being cocked.

The moment the door closed, Patterson leaped up and hugged Jack in his arms. "God guide us and protect us," he cried, "and forgive me for telling the blackest and biggest lee man ever uttered! The accursed seed of Satan, the revin', God-forsaken blasphemers, the cut-throat sons of Belial; but I'll be even with them. Quick, Davis, help me with this table, that I may see ont of the skylight what they're doing. Eh, man, just hear them! They've found one of our poor fellows up in the rigging, and they're worrying him as terriers do a rat."

In a moment the ready lad was on the table, and with his eye cautiously raised to the level of the glass. He was silent for a moment; but his hands were clenched, and the perspiration dripped from his brow. There was a sound of a heavy body dragged over the deck, then a sound of shattered glass.

"Oh, what is it, dear Sandy? Do tell me. Oh, what dreadful things are they doing?" said Jack.

Patterson replied in a low voice, and with face glued to the glass: "It is the poor steward, Jack. They've tied him to the mast, and they're pelting him with champagne bottles. He is streaming with blood, and his hands are clasped. Hear the cries! Now one of them steps up with a drawn knife—O merciful Father! I dare not look again."

As he uttered this exclamation, Patterson leaped down from the table, and sat himself on a chair, and hid his face with his hands. "Jack," said he, at last, looking up, "as I live by bread, it would be doing a duty to set fire to the vessel, and burn these wretches. It had been better for us to have cursed their prophet, and died holy martyrs like Mr. Jobson."

"No, no, dear Sandy," said Jack, cuddling himself near him. "Think of David. God has not saved us without a good purpose. There's many a lowering morning, you used to say, that brings on a fine day."

"Ye're right; ye're right, bairn," said Patterson. "Come and kneel down, and pray the Lord Jehovah—who put to flight the armies of Assyrians, who set the stars to fight in their courses against Sisera, who made the Red Sea like bird-lime for those awful rascals, the Egyptians—to give our hands strength, and our brains wisdom to beguile these children of Belial."

The cruel massacre had been but too complete. Two sailors only were left, and they stood by the wheel, with six armed men with drawn sabres to guard them. The firemen below were left to manage the furnaces; and the scuttle leading down into the engine-room was also watched by a dozen men with loaded pistols. The murdered men's bodies had been flung overboard to the sharks, and the decks washed. Three or four of the Malays, who had been sailors, were up aloft taking in a sail, for the ship's course had been altered, and the little wind there was was now against them.

The chief and some twenty of the fanatics were eating their simple meal of rice and curry in the chief cabin. Patterson and Jack were waiting on the guests with feigned humility, closely watched by the suspicious Hadji Hanna. Once, and once only, Patterson contrived to get close to Jack as he removed a dish, and said: "If I could only get to the doctor's room, Jack, I could get enough arsenic to kill all these rats in half an hour; but they won't let me out of their sight."

A howl, as from a wild beast, made the boys start. It was Hadji Hanna.

"Red Head," he said, "thou hadst the care of the Hakim's drugs; where are they? The Son of Heaven desires opium: find it within half an hour, or thou diest."

Patterson's heart leaped for joy. "Son of the Faithful," he exclaimed, prostrating himself. "I know where there is opium, but it is unprepared. Let thy servant prepare it. One of thy followers can go with me, and stand over me, armed, till it is ready."

"Go; and Yassaktshi, go thou with him; so that we may have the dream-producer, that gladdeneth the heart of the Prophet and his followers."

When Patterson was gone, Jack's heart leaped for joy, for he saw, desperate as was their condition, some hope of deliverance.

In the meantime, the wretches in their language, unknown to the boy, discussed the murders of the day.

"And thou, too, wert not idle," said the chief to Hadji Hanna.

"I slew the captain with my own hand; and I slew and stabbed four of the infidels—one in the rigging, one in his hammock, one in the hold, and one on the cabin stairs. Be praised, Heaven, and glory to his Prophet!"

"And I threw an infidel overboard," said another.

"And I beat out the brains of the cook."

"And I chopped down the Christian priest as he tried to shoot me; but we are invulnerable. Glory be to Heaven and the Prophet! But here the Red Head comes with the opium. Wah Gooroo! it sends blessed dreams."

"It is good," said Hadji Hanna; "it is fit only for the faithful; it takes us to heaven before the time. Quick, Red Head; and you, Yellow Hair, bring the smoking tubes of the dead infidels; we can turn them into opium-pipes."

Patterson left, and returned in a moment with twenty or thirty pipes and some hot charcoal from the cook's galley. A large cake of the moist black paste was prepared; and the taciturn chief and his followers, arranging cushions on the floor, settled themselves to their intoxicated sleep.

Patterson eyed them with the eye of a raven watching a sick lamb. Jack was breathless, because he saw that Patterson had some scheme in contemplation, and he dreaded its failure.

The opium was powerful. One by one ceased to talk, and fell back in dreamy repose, with eyes fixed and dilated, upon their cushions, the pipes still in their mouths. One or two made faint efforts to rise, then fell back, with hands half raised to their swords; but the most, including the chief, Hadji Hanna, and Yassaktshi, lapsed slowly into a death-like torpor—pale, but breathing heavily and loud.

Patterson and Jack stood by the sideboard surrounded by twenty entranced and helpless men. "It gangs weel—it gangs weel," said Patterson, in a whisper, as if afraid of awaking the sleeping ruffians, "thanks to the Papaver dioscorides and the drachms of morphine. A little more, and I could have sent the blood-thirsty gang to their ain place; but I thought I'd keep them alive for an English gibbet. But, Jack, our work's not half done yet; quick, gather up the pipes; we must take them on deck, fresh loaded, to the scoundrels at the wheel and on the engine-room stairs. As sure as there is heather in the Highlands, another day and I'd have dosed their rice with arsenic, and they ought to be thankful. Come, Jack, quick! the pipes."

Jack and Patterson gathered up the pipes, and in a minute afterwards were on deck with him, fresh filled and relit.

"Brothers of the faith," said Patterson, "the Prophet has sent you two hours of heaven in these opium-pipes. The relief guard will be up before your sleep begins. Take them, and thank God for sending his blessed Prophet."

The men took them with shouts of "Wah Gooroo!" and needed no inducement to at once begin.

The Hindus at the engine-room stairs accepted them with no less alacrity. In a few minutes the irresistible drug worked its effects and the deck was strewed with sleeping men.

Then Patterson seemed all of a sudden to go stark staring mad—he hugged Jack; he danced the Highland fling; he shouted, he screamed; he ran away up the rigging, and down again; finally, he ran to the astonished men at the wheel, and dragging them on their knees, cried: "Down with ye, Johnson; down with ye, Jarvis; down with ye, Jack, and thank God—who smote in the night the whole camp of Assyria, who made the earth open and swallow up Dathan and the whole company of Abiram—for delivering the good ship Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy from the hands of the Philistines. Here let me take a hand at the wheel, while I turn her head back to Singapore and ye run and take a look at the God-forsaken sons of Belial, all lying like drugged fish down in the state cabin—thanks to the essence of morphine and the Papaver dioscorides."

"But you don't mean to say that you really have done this," cried Johnson.

"Sandy, you're mad," exclaimed Jarvis.

"Come and see for yourselves, returned Jack, taking their hands, as if they were children going walking. "Come, and see what the brave Sandy has been and done; call up the firemen too—all that can leave the fires—and give a hurrah, for the ship's our own, and we've got a rope round the blackguard's necks."

"Well, they have got pluck, eh, Bill?" said Johnson to Jarvis.

"It's the neatest go I ever see," said Jarvis to Johnson, as he rolled Baloo Singh under his foot.

"Well, I never," said one of the firemen.

"That chap'll be an admiral some day, or my name's not Jarvis," said that worthy.

"And when I am," said Patterson, with a grim smile, "Jack shall be post-captain. But quick, lads—I'm in command now—to business before pleasure. Get some three-quarter-inch rope, and tie these fellows hand and foot, and throw them in the hold. Remove all their knives and pistols, and search their pockets; then batten down the hatches; and I and Jack will mount guard over them and tell them our minds when they come to."

"My eyes! when they they come to, old Hullabaloo'll think he's dead again," said Jarvis.

"And that fat butcher of his, won't he cut up rough?"

A passion of revenge suddenly shone in Johnson's eyes; he swore an oath and slowly cocked his revolver and bent over Hadji Hanna.

"He spared none of our messmates," he said, grinding his teeth, "and now I'll settle his account."

Patterson leaped forward, seized the revolver, and threw it into a side-cabin.

"Come; no mutiny, Jarvis," he said: "I tell you I'll not have a hair of their heads touched. They shall answer for these crimes in another way. We'll not repay murder with murder. Remember the holy book: 'Vengeance is mine; I will repay it, saith the Lord.' Touch these men, and I will shoot you down as I would a mad dog."

"Well, I'll be hanged if Sandy is not a mixture of the parson and the king of the Sandwich Islands," grumbled Jarvis. "But I suppose we must knock under, for he got us out of the mess."

The sleeping men were collected, and thrown, not very gently (especially by Jarvis,) into the hold like so many cotton-bales. It took two days to get back to Singapore with that insufficient crew: and the quantity of food given to the prisoners during that time was hardly worth mentioning.

Small as the crew was, they were sufficient, thanks to Patterson's energy, to crowd up every piece of colored bunting that was in the vessel an hour before they entered Singapore.

It was soon known that the Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy had had a mutiny on board; but, thanks to the courage and prudence of two boys—the cabin-boy and the doctor's boy—the mutineers had been seized, and the ship recovered.

An hour after the arrival of the Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy, Patterson and Davis stood blushing, and yet delighted, before the harbor-master and several officers, who had come to hear the convicts examined. Pale and scowling, the Prophet and his followers stood in the compound adjoining the harbor-master's house, guarded by a detachment of English soldiers.

"And now, my brave boy," said the harbor-master, "tell us by what means you succeeded in counterplotting these murdering niggers."

"Weel, it was just Papaver dioscorides," replied Patterson, pulling at the tuft of his Scotch bonnet. "I was doctor's boy on board the Jamsetjee, and when I was not reading the Word of God or the Seaman's Manual, I was just studying the nature of herbs, drugs and minerals, little thinking what use I should one day make of them against the sons of Belial."

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

Nothing could be truly learned, nor any value attached to experience, but for the invariable connection of cause and effect, and the certainty and fixity of the laws of creation. When providential government is admitted to be regular and undeviating, then, and then only, is an unlimited field of exertion and education opened to the intellect. Were the Creator liable to be influenced by caprice, or to be diverted from his purposes by entreaty, His works would not only be involved in ridiculous confusion, but would be intelligible to Himself alone, and destitute of meaning and instruction to his rational creatures. The philosopher would then be really no nearer to heaven than the ploughman. Nature must ever remain an object of childish wonder, not of intelligent study.—R. W. Mackay—Progress of the Intellect, Book I., Sec. 7.

I read in the Scriptures the praises of meekness; but when I see a man meek or patient of injury through tameness or imbecility, or want of self-respect—passively gentle, meek through constitution or fear—I look on him with feelings very different from veneration. It is the meekness of principle; it is mildness replete with energy; it is the forbearance of a man who feels a wrong, but who curbs anger—who, though injured, resolves to be just—who voluntarily remembers that his foe is a man and a brother—who dreads to surrender himself to his passions—who in the moment of provocation subjects himself to reason and religion, and who holds fast the great truth that the noblest victory over a foe is to disarm and subdue him in equity and kindness—it is this meekness which I venerate, and which seems to me one of the divinest virtues. It is moral power—the strength of virtuous purpose pervading meekness—which gives it all its title to respect. Channing—Self-Denial.

Here we see a young man, but little more than thirty years old, with no advantage of position; the son and companion of rude people; born in a town whose inhabitants were wicked to a proverb; of a nation distinguished above all others for their superstition, for national pride, exaltation of themselves and contempt for all others; in an age of singular corruption, when the substance of religion had faded out from the mind of its anointed ministers, and sin had spread wide among a people turbulent, oppressed and down-trodden; a man, ridiculed for his lack of knowledge, in this nation of forms, hypocritical priests and corrupt people, falls back on simple morality, simple religion, unites in himself the sublimest precepts and divinest practices—thus more than realizing the dream of prophets and sages—rises free from all prejudices of his age, nation or sect; gives full free range to the spirit of God in his breast; sets aside the law—sacred and time-honored as it was—its forms, its sacrifice, its temples and its priests; puts away the doctors of the law, subtle, learned, irrefragible, and pours out a doctrine beautiful as the light, sublime as heaven, and true as God.—Theodore Parker—Discourse III., 6.

The religion that the world is dying for is not a treasure, valued and cherished, indeed, but cherished under a glass case in the best room, carefully dusted, and visible only on days of high festival. We want a religion that is an atmosphere, wrapping us about, above and below: going down into the lungs in deep-drawn inspirations to purify and energize; filtering into the blood to tint and quicken; spreading out in the skin, to protect and adorn; piercing noisesome cellars to dispel the noxious, death-dealing vapors; mounting into the parlors and bed-rooms and kitchens, to keep them sweet and healthful; permeating and interpenetrating all things; a savor of life unto life. We want religion that softens the step, and tones the voice to melody, and fills the eye with sunshine, and checks the impatient exclamation and the harsh rebuke; a religion that is polite, deferential to superiors, courteous to inferiors and considerate of friends; a religion that goes into the family and keeps the husband from being spiteful when the dinner is late, and keeps the dinners from being late, keeps the wife from fretting when the husband tracks the newly-washed floor with his muddy boots, and makes the husband mindful of the scraper and the door-mat, keeps the mother pleasant when the baby is cross, and keeps the baby pleasant, amuses the children as well as instructs them, wins as well as governs, cares for servants, besides paying them promptly, projects the honey-moon into the harvest-moon and makes the happy home like the eastern fig-tree bearing in its bosom at once the beauty of the tender blossom and the glory of the ripened fruit; a religion that looks after the apprentice in the shop, and the clerk behind the counter, and the student in the office, with a fatherly care and a motherly love, setting the solitary in families, introducing them to pleasant and wholesome society, that their lonely feet may not be led into temptation, forgiving occasional cases while striving to prevent them, and to supply, so far as may be, the place of the natural guardians by a vigilance that attract swithout annoying.—Gail Hamilton's Stumbling Blocks.

A number of the [great] men [of Greece], exhibited by the biographers and historians, rose so eminently above the general character of the human race that their names have become inseparably associated with our ideas of moral greatness. A thoughtful student of antiquity enters this majestic company with an impression of mystical awfulness, resembling that of Ezekiel in his vision. In this select and revered assembly we include only those who were distinguished by elevated virtue as well as powerful talents and memorable actions. Undoubtedly the magnificent powers and energy without moral excellence so often displayed on the field of ancient history, compel a kind of prostration of the soul in the presence of men whose surpassing achievements seem to silence for a while, and but for a while, the sense of justice which must execrate their ambition and their crimes; but where greatness of mind seems but secondary to greatness of virtue, as in the examples of Phocion, Epaminondas, Aristides, Timoleon, Dion Cimon, and several more, the heart applauds itself for feeling an irresistible captivation. This number, indeed, is small compared with the whole galaxy of renowned names; but it is large enough to fill the mind, and to give as venerable an impression of pagan greatness as if none of its examples had been the heroes whose fierce brilliance lighteus through the blackness of their depravity; or the legislators, orators and philosophers, whose wisdom was degraded by imposture, venality or vanity.

A most impressive part of the influence of ancient character on modern feelings is derived from the accounts of two or three of the greatest philosophers, whose virtue, protesting and solitary, in the times in which they lived—whose intense devotedness in the pursuit of wisdom, and whose occasional sublime glimpses of apprehension received from beyond the sphere of error in which they were enclosed and benighted—present them to the mind with something like the venerableness of the prophets of God. Among the exhibitions of this kind it is unnecessary to say that Xenophon's Memoir of Socrates stands unrivalled and above comparison. Sanguine spirits without number have probably been influenced in modern times by the ancient history of mere heroes; but persons of a reflective disposition have been incomparably more affected by the contemplation of those men whose combination of mental power with illustrious virtue constitutes the supreme glory of heathen antiquity. And why do I deem the admiration of this noble display of moral excellence pernicious to those reflective minds, in relation to the religion of Christ? For the simplest possible reason: because the principles of that excellence are not identical with the principles of his religion; as I believe every serious and self-observant man who has been attentive to them both will have verified in his own experience.—John Foster—Aversion of Men of Taste to Evangelical Religion.

It is truly vexatious, eighteen hundred years after Paul's career, to have to fight Paul's battle against those who profess themselves not only his grateful children, but his unreasoning obedient disciples. It is, indeed, superfluous here to prove what is on the face of the New Testament, that Sundays are not Sabbaths; that Sabbaths are no part of Gentile Christianity, and that Sundays have in the Scripture nothing to do with abstinence from worldly business. The Puritan school of England and Scotland shuts its eyes to the plainest facts, because it believes it to be useful to hold that Sunday is Sabbath and Sabbath binding upon us. In vain shall we point to Paul's contemptuous disavowal of Sabbaths, and his declaration that he who disregards sacred days is justified, so that he only disregard them to the Lord. In vain may it be proved from the Christian history that, until Constantine, Sunday was a working day with Christians. In vain will it be shown that all the great reformers held the ancient and popular doctrine that the observance of Sunday is a mere ordinance of the Church, not a command of God; and that, until the English and Scotch Sabbatarians (towards the close of the sixteenth century) invented the Puritanical doctrine on this subject, it was unknown to the Christian Church. As long as Englishmen care more for supposed expediency than for truth they will, through thick and thin, stickle for a divinely obligatory Sabbath, unless one show them that this falsehood has its evil and dangerous side. Our ears are dinned with the false cry, "The Sabbath, the boon of the working man." In many cases say, rather, his bane. He rests from labor—true; but he labors only so much the harder on the other six days. Physically, he would be better for laboring six hours on Sunday and one hour less on every other day. Spiritually, also, this would be far better: First, for the irreligious man; for the irreligious are tempted to make it a day of carousing and sensuality, and the more its sanctity is preached, the greater is this danger; because it makes their conscience bad, and generally hinders them from getting any but bad companions. More sin of every kind in England and Scotland is committed on Sunday than on any other day of the week; and of this, the (so called) Sabbatical institution is in a great measure guilty. Then as for the less religious, yet conscientious man, the Sunday hangs heavy upon him; it is a stupid, sleepy day; superstition forbids his even improving his mind during its hours; and with one-seventh part of time left free, he still (strange to think!) has no leisure for cultivation. Puritanical notions about the Sabbath are thus, at present, the greatest of all impediments to the effectual education of the industrious classes. Thirdly, even for the sincerely religious poor, Sunday is far too long a day for continued spiritual thought. They have not inward energy enough to fill up the time with it, and they covet to be in church as much as possible; very generally three "services" do not seem to them too much; but this very fact proves that their souls are passive under it all, and get no more good than they might get from one. Far better would it be to have on Sundays hours of work, say from 6 to 9 in the morning and from 5 to 8 in the evening; with one meeting in church to last from 11 to 12.—F. W. Newman—The Soul.

It is not our beliefs and convictions that frighten us half so much as our fancies.

CHARADES—BY PRAED.

THE poet, Praed, excelled as a charade-maker. We copy the following from his published poems. The one beginning "Sir Hilary charged at Agincourt," has never been satisfactorily answered, though many solutions have been attempted. The others are easy of answer.

MORNING is beaming o'er brake and bower,
Hark! to the chimes from yonder tower,
Call ye my First from her chamber now,
With her snowy veil and her jeweled brow.

Lo! where my Second, in gorgeous array,
Leads from his stable her beautiful bay,
Looking for her, as he curvets by,
With an arching neck, and a glancing eye.

Spread is the banquet, and studied the song;
Ranged in meet order the menial throng,
Jerome is ready with book and stole,
And the maidens fling flowers, but where is my Whole.

Look to the hill, is he climbing its side?
Look to the stream—is he crossing its tide?
Out on the false one! he comes not yet—
Lady, forget him, yea, scorn and forget.

MY first was dark o'er earth and air,
As dark as she could be!
The stars that gemmed her ebon hair
Were only two or three:
King Cole saw twice as many there
As you or I could see.

"Away, King Cole," mine hostess said,
"Flagon and flask are dry;
Your nag is neighing in the shed,
For he knows a storm is nigh."
She sat my Second on his head,
And she set it all awry.

SIR HILARY charged at Agincourt—
Sooth 'twas an awful day!
And though in that old age of sport
The ruffiers of the camp and court
Had little time to pray,
'Tis said Sir Hilary muttered there
Two syllables by way of prayer.

My First to all the brave and prond
Who see to-morrow's sun;
My Next with her cold and quiet cloud
To those who find their dewy shroud
Before to-day's be done;
And both together to all blue eyes
That weep when a warrior nobly dies

HE talked of daggers and of darts,
Of passions and of pains,
Of weeping eyes and wounded hearts,
Of kisses and of chains;
He said, though love was kin to grief,
He was not born to grieve;
He said, though many rued belief,
She safely might believe;
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My Whole was all that he had said
And all that he could say.

He said, my First—whose silent car
Was slowly wandering by,
Veiled in a vapor faint and far
Through the unfathomed sky—
Was like the smile whose rosy light
Across her young lips passed,
Yet oh! it was not half so bright,
It changed not half so fast;
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My Whole was all that he had said,
And all that he could say.

And then he set a cypress wreath
Upon his raven hair,
And drew his rapier from its sheath,
Which made the lady stare;
And said, his life-blood's purple flow
My Second there should dim,
If she he loved and worshipped so
Would only weep for him;
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My Whole was all that he had said,
And all that he could say.

"JUST BURN IT."—Late one bitter cold night in December, some eight or nine years ago, Chump went into the coffee-room of the Golden Boot, Eastbourne, to take part in what was going on. For some reason the crowd had dispersed sooner than was customary, but two or three of the town folks were there, together with a strange man, who had arrived half an hour or so before, and who, tired, wet and muddy from a long Sussex ride, his legs extended and shoes off, was consoling himself with two chairs and a nap opposite the centre of a blazing fire. Any one who has travelled until 10 o'clock on a rough winter night can appreciate the fruition before that fire-place. The drowsy example of the stranger had its effect on the others, and Chump, who took a seat in the corner, for lack of conversation was reduced to the poker for amusement. He poked the fire vigorously a while, until the poker got red hot, and, becoming disgusted, was about to drop it and retire, when he remarked the great toe of one of the stranger's feet protruding through a hole in his sock.

Here was a relief to our friend Chump. He placed the glowing poker within a foot of the melancholy sleeper's toe and began to lessen the distance between them.

One by one the others, as they caught the joke, began to open their eyes, and being awakened, mouths expanded into grins and suppressed giggles, and one inconsistent fellow broke into a broad laugh.

Closer and closer the red-hot poker neared the unfortunate toe. The heat caused the sleeper to move his foot. Chump was about applying the poker, when a sound of click! click! arrested his attention. He looked at the stranger—the latter with one eye open, had been watching the whole proceeding, and silently brought a pistol to bear on Chump.

In a voice just audible, muttered in a tone of great determination, he said—

"Just burn it! Burn it! Just burn it. and I'll be hanged if I don't stir you up with ten thousand hot pokers in two seconds!"

Chump laid down his poker instantly, and remarked—

"What will you take to drink?—in fact, gentlemen, all of you?"

Chump afterwards said that was the cheapest treat he ever stood.

FUNNY PARAGRAPHS.

COLERIDGE was a very clumsy rider. When once ont on horseback an impertinent young fellow said to him: "Did you meet a tailor, sir, down the road?" Coleridgo replied: "Yes, and he told me I would meet a goose."

SWIFT wrote the following couplet for a man who kept an ale-house and a barber-shop in the same room:

Rove not from pole to pole, but stop in here,
Where nought excels the shaving but the beer.

THE following epitaph was written for a monument of Charles I.:

So fell the royal oak by a wild crew
Of mongrel shrubs that underneath him grew;
So fell the lion by a pack of curs;
So the rose withered twixt a knot of hurrs;
So fell the eagle by a swarm of gnats;
So the whale perished by a shoal of sprats.

A POET asked a gentleman what he thought of his last production—An Ode to Sleep. The latter replied: "You have done so much justice to the subject that it is impossible to read it without its whole weight.

"AFTER all," said a woman once to a man who was ridiculing her loquacity, "I know many men who talk more than women." "Yes," was the reply, "more to the point."

Whoe'er has travelled Life's dull round,
Where'er his stages may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found
The warmest welcome at an inn.—Shenstone.

SYDNEY SMITH in his celebrated Peter Plymley letters, affords a notable illustration of the powers of rhetoric in written eloquence. As instance this passage, apropos of the English Embargo Act, by which, among other things, drugs were, for the moment, excluded from France:

"THEY may talk as much as they please," said Mrs. Partington to Ike, as she weepingly peeled the onions for her Saturday's stew; "I say, they may talk till dumbsday about their Ark of Triumph in Paris, but I resist upon it that the greatest ark of triumph known in the world's annals was Noah's, which triumphed over the deluge, and that," she continued, brandishing an onion, "is the opinion of all the distinguished arkeologists and learned aquarians who are familiar with the records of iniquity." Ike smiled broadly, but the old lady's tears blinded her to the disrespect of the youthful vagabond.

A CERTAIN baronet, having become bankrupt, a subscription was set on foot by his friends, and a letter soliciting a contribution was addressed to Lord Erskine, who replied thus:

MY DEAR SIR JOHN.—I am in general an enemy to subscriptions of this nature; first, because my own finances are by no means in a flourishing plight; and secondly, because pecuniary assistance, thus conferred, must be equally painful to the donor and receiver. As I feel, however, the sincerest gratitude for your public services, and regard for your public worth, I have great pleasure in subscribing—(here the worthy Barouet, big with expectation, turned over the leaf, and finished the perusal of the note which terminated as follows,)—in subscribing myself, My dear Sir John, yours very faithfully,

ERSKINE.

MY gravity in the pulpit was once very much disturbed. Very near me sat a pompous little man with a big bushy head of fiery red hair. In the pew behind him were two boys. The weather was very cold and these boys pretended to regard the red hair as a fire. One of them held up his open palms before it for a while, and then, as if the heat were too great, would withdraw them and rub the palms over the backs of his hands to distribute the heat equally; and so on. The other played blacksmith. He thrust the forefinger of his left hand into the imaginary fire, and, after leaving it there a while, pulled it out and held it up as a smith does a rod of iron, but thinking it not hot enough, he put it back and presently pulled it out again, and with his knee for an anvil and his right forefinger for a hammer, he began to pound it briskly, turning it from side to side at every blow.

"Such a project is well worthy the statesmen who would bring the French to reason by keeping them without rhubarb, and exhibit to mankind the awful spectacle of a nation deprived of neutral salts. This is not the dream of a wild apothecary indulging in his own opium; it is not the distempered fancy of a compounder of drugs, delirious from smallness of profits; but it is the sober, deliberate and systematic scheme of a man to whom the public safety is intrusted, and whose appointment is considered by many as a masterpiece of political sagacity. What a sublime thought, that no purge can now be taken between the Weser and the Garonne; that the bustling pestle is still, the clamorous mortar mute, and the bowels of mankind locked up for fourteen degrees of latitude! When, I should be curious to know, were all the powers of crudity and flatulence fully explained to his majesty's ministers? At what period was their great plan of conquest and constipation fully developed? In whose mind was the idea of destroying the pride and the plasters of France first engendered? Without castor oil, they might, for some months have carried on a lingering war; but can they do without bark? Will the people live under a government where antimonial powder cannot be procured? Will they bear the loss of mercury?—'There's the rub.' Depend upon it, the absence of the materia medica will soon bring them to their senses, and the cry of 'Bourbon and Bolus' burst forth from the Baltic to the Mediterranean."

THE MUSTARD POULTICE.—A curious story is going the rounds of a mistake in a mustard poultice at a hotel. A lady whose husband was suffering from a cold, got up at midnight and went below to fetch a mustard poultice. In the agitation of her soul, she mistook the room on her return, and went into one where there was a light burning as dimly as in that she left—a room altogether similar, and apparently her husband in bed fast asleep. She applied the mustard poultice to his chest, and sat quietly at his bedside till it began to draw. It did draw; but it drew an infuriated scream from the poor fellow who had been the subject of her unconscious solicitude. At the sound of the unaccustomed voice, the nature of the accident which had befallen her and her patient was at once visible, and she rushed headlong from the mustarded man into the arms of her liege lord. Both parties told their story the next day, and had to leave amidst the derisive laughter of the hotel occupants.

CHIPPING AN EGG WITH NASMYTH'S HAMMER.—A statement recently made, that the Nasmyth hammer could as easily chip a piece of shell from an egg as thunder down at a ten-ton force having been doubted, an experiment was made in the presence of several persons. Mr. P dbury, of the dockyard, procured an egg, which was placed in a wine-glass. The ponderous iron hammer was raised, and down it came, not with its usual crash, but gently and surely. So delicate was the stroke, that the egg was chipped and the glass left unbroken

SUFFICIENTLY REWARDED.—The last joke at the expense of the French Society for the Protection of Animals is to the following effect: A countryman, armed with an immense club, presents himself before the president of the society, and claims the first prize. He is asked to describe the act of humanity on which he founds his claim. "I saved the life of a wolf," replied the countryman. "I might easily have killed him with this bludgeon," and he swings his weapon in the air to the intense discomfort of the president. "But where was the wolf?" inquires the latter, "what had he done to you?" "He had just devoured my wife," is the reply. The president reflects an instant, and then says: "My friend, I am of opinion that you have been sufficiently rewarded."

VITALITY OF THE SAMBAR DEER.—"When the sun got low, the wild cry of the pea-fowl commenced; soon after, the deer began to call, and a stag showed himself, rising from a clump of fern. As soon as he had settled to feed, I moved to get the wind of him, lying down whenever he raised his head, and advancing again when he stooped to graze. Half an hour of intense excitement was passed. He fed on quietly, while I was creeping closer, closer, watching every movement he made, and ready to fire the moment he showed a symptom of alarm. At last I found myself within certain range, and taking a steady aim with the two-ounce rifle, fired. I heard the ball hit, but he never staggered, and stood perfectly still, gazing stupidly about him. Snatching up the double rifle, I gave him right and left, when he sprang into a gallop, and in his blind terror (for he did not appear to have any intention of charging) came right at me. Having no barrel loaded, I received him on my hunting-knife, the blade of which, eighteen inches in length, sank to the hilt in his chest, and again I buried it in his body before he was clear of me. On he rushed madly, with erected mane the blood pouring from his breast and dyeing the grass so effectually that I knew there was no chance of losing him now, go where he would; so I reloaded, and followed on his trail. When I came in sight of him he was going quietly along, following the bed of a ravine, and apparently seeking for water. Hearing me behind him he turned his head, and a two-ounce ball instantly crashed through his skull; but still he stood firm, although apparently insensible, and never moved till I had reloaded and planted another ball between his eyes, when he dropped at last. On examining the deer, I found one ball had passed right through him at the shoulder, a little above the heart; another through his neck, close to the shoulder; a third through his ribs; the fourth through his skull, but too high up to touch the brain: and the fifth, which finished him, between the eyes. After this who can wonder at losing a sambar even when well hit? Such extraordinary tenacity of life I could not have credited had I not witnessed it."—My Indian Journal, by Col. Campbell.

A CURIOUS PENANCE.—A singular penitential service has been performed at Whitby for the last seven hundred years It was first imposed upon Percy, Bruce and Allatson, three gentlemen boar-huntors, who wounded a hermit in Eskdale Side, October 16th, 1159. He died of his wounds December 8th, or 18th, which would be in 1160, as the ecclesiastical year begins with Advent. By this cruel murder the said Percy, Bruce and Allatson forfeited their lives and their estates; and the Abbot of Whitby, as in duty bound, had them brought to justice, and was about to enforce the law against them, when the dying hermit interposed, saying, "I will freely forgive these men my death, if they will perform this penance." And the men being present, said: "Impose what you please upon us, only spare our lives." Then the holy hermit entreated the Abbot that their lives might be spared, if they would perform penance for the good of their souls. And that they should also hold their lands of the Abbot of Whitby on this condition: namely, that on Ascension Eve they should each of them cut a certain quantity of hedging near where he was killed, with a knife which shall cost one penny, and bring it on their backs to Whitby by nine o'clock, A. M.—if it be full sea at such hour, the penance to cease,—and each of them to make a hedge at the water's edge, and to fix it so as to stand three tides without being washed away. The Abbot's officer was to attend them and to blow "Out upon you, out upon you" three times with his horn, to remind them of their heinous crime, and move them to contrition. This service has been performed every year, as it never can be full sea at nine, A. M., on Ascension Day, and it is still continued by the Allatsons and their successors, whose land is in Fylingdales. It remained in the Allatson family till 1755, since which it has been owned by a family called Herbert, by whom the hedge has been regularly made every year, as it is expressly stipulated in their writings. Mrs. Keane, the wife of the present incumbent of Whitby, is a representative of the Allatson family, being fourth in descent from the last Allatson family who sold the estate; but the service is not now done in a penitential spirit, and with the original design. It benefits neither the living nor the dead. The historians of Whitby have strangely confounded it with the making up of the Horngarth, which was quite a different thing, being altogether for secular purposes, while the penny hedge was only a penance and could never serve any other purpose; besides, the Horngarth was made up long before 1159, and has long since been dispensed with, while the penny hedge is still made up every year by one of the parties, and the legal title to an estate depends on its being so continued. There are two versions of this legend: they are substantially the same, though they vary in several particulars. It is evident that they have not been copied or translated from the same original, but have come down to us probably from oral tradition. The curious reader can see one version in Grose's British Antiquities, and the other in the History of Whitby.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.—We would call our readers' attention to the advertisement of the above Institute on another page. It is conducted by Physicians who are graduates of the first Colleges in Europe, and who have particularly devoted themselves to the cure of special Diseases. It is already taking its place as a most valuable Institute.

MOST OF OUR LADY READERS are, no doubt, aware of the fact that the beautiful embroidery on cloaks and dresses so fashionable, can only be executed on the Grover & Baker Sewing-Machine. This machine, always a favorite in the family, has now become indispensable. Unlike other machines, it is ever ready to perform, in the most perfect manner, every kind of plain or ornamental sewing that may be required; and we are not surprised to find it carrying off the highest premiums at the different State fairs now being held throughout the country.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following notices reach us from the Eastern press:

We have received the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly journal just started in San Francisco, under the editorial charge of Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman well known to New York journalism. Mr. Webb was for several years attached to the editorial staff of the New York Times, where he occupied the responsible post of literary editor, and where his criticisms were the object of special remark for their freshness and piquancy. His new enterprise, THE CALIFORNIAN, bears the impress of his editorial skill on every page. It is a handsome paper of sixteen pages, about the size of the Round Table before it was cut down, and not unlike that journal in character and scope. It is printed upon a quality of paper which in these days seems almost prodigally fine. If such a journal can be sustained in California it is certainly a good token for the literary taste of the land of gold. At all events judging from the first number, no man is more capable of directing its career in a successful path than its projector and editor.—Boston Transcript.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new literary paper with this title comes to us from San Francisco. It is refreshing to the eyes of a printer to read its beautiful print upon clean white paper, and its contents are rich and varied, bearing mark of care and scholarship, enlivened with a vein of humor, that promises for it a position in the first rank of our native publications. It is edited by Charles H. Webb, Esq., formerly of the New York Times, and latterly the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, whose department of racy "Things" in that paper was read with delight by every one this way on whom the Era dawned. "Things"—snappy and epigrammatic as ever—have a place in THE CALIFORNIAN, and we would press upon our readers that they could do no better than send on and subscribe for it. The paper bears at its head the motto, appropriate for its own character, as well as for the State: "Surely there is a vein for the silver and a place for the gold where they fine it."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly journal just started in San Francisco, is a remarkably handsome paper of sixteen pages, printed in a superior manner and made up of editorial and selected matter indicating ability and excellent judgment. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a well-known New York journalist, is the editor, and he seems to have entered upon his work with a vigor that, if continued, will render his paper inferior to no literary newspaper in America. Mr. Webb has gained a name for freshness, piquancy and spirit in his writings, and will undoubtedly make THE CALIFORNIAN a household friend not in San Francisco only but in every Eastern city.—Boston Post.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published in a handsome quarto form, and conducted by Mr. C. H. Webb, formerly one of the editors of the New York Times. Mr. Webb is a pleasant and versatile writer, and won an excellent reputation during his experience of journalism in this city. He went to California one or two years ago, but ventured for the first time upon an independent enterprise in May last, when the first number of the CALIFORNIAN appeared. The paper claims to be "devoted to live topics and the best interests of California," and inasmuch as it shows a disposition to redeem this promise, being very lively and honest, it deserves success.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The following are a few of the notices which have appeared in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the CALIFORNIAN is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest publication known to us. The CALIFORNIAN is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call. June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best bow on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-bred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds : "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which by some injudicious prescription had been converted into an asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that that "prescription" was not

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute;

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, Dr. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be treated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute. Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. THE BURIED HEART.

"I sleep, but my heart wakoth."

TREAD lightly, love, when over my head,
Beneath the daisies lying,
And tenderly press the grassy bed
Where the fallen rose lies dying.

Dreamless I sleep in the quiet ground,
Save when, your foot-fall hearing,
My heart awakes to the old-loved sound
And hents to the step that's nearing.

Bright shone the moon, last eve, when you came—
Still dust for dust hath feeling—
The willow-roots whispered low the name
Of him who weeps while kneeling.

The lily-cup holds the falling tears,
The tears you shed above me;
And I know through all these silent years
There's some one still to love me.

Oh, softly sigh; for I hear the sound
And grieve me o'er your sorrow;
But leave a kiss in the myrtle mound—
I'll give it back to-morrow.

Whisper me, love, as in moments fled,
While I dream your hand mine taketh;
For the stone speaks false that says "She's dead;"
"I sleep, but my heart awaketh."

DENNAR STEWART.

BIRDIE BELL.

SAT a robin in a tree,
Warbling, oh, so merrily;
Underneath the blossoms fell,
Spangling our sweet Birdie Bell.
"Birdie Bell,
Where's its wings?"
Thus the snuey
Robin sings.

Birdie Bell, the winsome fay,
Seeming but a stolen ray
Through the rustling, blooming bowers,
Heedless sings and strings the flowers.
"Birdie Bell,
Where's its wings?"
Still the peeping
Robin sings.

Happy robin, mite of glee,
Singing in the apple tree,
Dost thou think our sunny elf
Pinioned as thy little self?
Birdie Bell
Wears no wings,
Though she like a
Robin sings.

Doubtful, Robin? Look again,
Thou wilt cease to wonder then:
For her plumage, golden hair—
Not the down that birdies wear—
Birdie Bell
Gently flings
From her bosom
As she sings.
